Respondent.

APPLICATION FOR EXTRAORDINARY RELIEF AND PETITION FOR WRIT OF HABEAS CORPUS

Petitioners, through their undersigned counsel, apply to this Honorable Court for relief from their unconstitutional sentences of death and further appropriate relief, and, in support thereof, state:

I.

PARTIES

Petitioners are all death-sentenced inmates presently incarcerated at Florida State Prisoh in Starke, Florida, whose convictions and sentences were affirmed by or whose appeals are currently pending before this Court. (See Appendix A filed herewith).

Respondent, Louie L. Wainwright, is the Secretary of the Department of Corrections in whose custody the petitioners are detained.

II.

JURISDICTION

The jurisdiction of this Court is invoked pursuant to Article V, Section 3(b)(1), (7) and (9) of the Constitution of the State of Florida (1980). See Adams v. State, 380 So2d 421(Fla.1980); Graham v. State, 372 So2d 1363(Fla. 1979); Proffitt v. State, 360 So2d 771(Fla. 1978). Petitioners seek relief in this Court because the issues raised herein involve this Court's appellate review of capital cases and do not involve the proceedings in the trial courts. Petitioners have filed jointly in the interest of judicial economy because of the common issues of law and fact presented. See In Re Baker, 267 So2d 331(Fla.1972).

III.

FACTUAL BASIS FOR RELIEF

This Court, since at least as early as 1975, has engaged in the continuing practice of requesting and receiving information concerning capital appellants which was not presented at trial and not a part of the trial record or record on appeal. The information includes but is not limited to: presentence investigation reports concerning the capital offense under review or prior convictions unrelated to the capital offense; psychiatric evaluations or contact notes; psychological screening reports; recitations of a capital defendant's refusal to submit to a psychiatric examination from which a report could be prepared; post-sentence investigation reports; probation or parole violation reports; and state prison classification and admissions summaries. Documentation of the practice is provided by the correspondence attached as Appendix B which is merely exemplary. Petitioners also attach in Appendix C newspaper accounts of the practice. While such accounts are admittedly hearsay, they are well-substantiated by the documents in Appendix B.

Except as to some of the presentence investigations pertaining to the offense on appeal the above information was requested and received without notice to the capital appellants or their attorneys.

Upon information and belief, a quantity of the information received by the Court, and of records reflecting the practice of requesting and receiving it as alleged in the preceeding paragraph, has at the Court's direction been destroyed or purged from this Court's files. As a result, it is no longer possible for petitioners to identify all of the cases in which such information was requested or received.

IV.

LEGAL CLAIMS

The request or receipt by this Court of undisclosed information in capital cases, as described above, violates inter alia, petitioners' rights under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States and Article I, Section 9 of the Constitution of the State of Florida; the right to counsel as guaranteed by the Sixth and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution of the United States and Article I, Section 16 of the Constitution of the State of Florida; the Eighth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States and Article I, Section 17 of the Constitution of the State of Florida; the privilege against self-incrimination as guaranteed by the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States and Article I, Section 9 of the Constitution of the State of Florida; the right to confrontation as guaranteed by the Sixth Amendment and Article I, Section 16 of the Constitution of the State of Florida; and the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States and Article I, Section 2 of the Constitution of the State of Florida.

A. The Due Process Right to Fair Capital Procedures

The practice described above violates Gardner v. Florida, 430 U.S. 349(1977). In Gardner, the United States Supreme Court held unconstitutional the imposition of a death sentence where, in considering what sentence to impose, a Florida circuit court had ordered and relied on a pre-sentence investigation report, portions of which were not disclosed to the parties. The plurality emphasized that, in capital cases, > it is now clear that the sentencing process as well as the trial iteself, must satisfy the requirements of the Due Process Clause . . . .

Id. at 358 (opinion of Mr. Justice Stevens). It held that due process was denied since "the death sentence was imposed, at least in part, on the basis of information which [petitioner] had no opportunity to deny or explain." Id. at 362. See also Green v. Georgia, 442 U.S. 95, 97(1979) and Presnell v. Georgia, 439 U.S. 14, 16(1978).

Gardner requires a similar conclusion here. The only real difference between Gardner and these cases is that here the secret information was gathered on appeal rather than at trial. Rather than providing a basis on which to distinguish these cases, this fact aggravates the unfairness to petitioners. The preparation of a pre-sentence report is a relatively normal and expectable occurrence in the trial court, and defense counsel might legitimately be expected to be on notice that such an event may happen, and, before Gardner at least, might engender confidential information. No lawyer familiar with Florida statutes, rules and procedures could be expected to anticipate, however, that without notice to the lawyer or the lawyer's client, this Court would request or receive information dehors the record. Here, certainly no less than in Gardner, it would be a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause "to impose the death sentence on the basis of confidential information which is not disclosed to the defendant or his counsel." Gardner v. Florida, supra, 430 U.S. at 358.

It is a further violation of Due Process for this Court to have consulted "evidential facts not spread upon the record," Ohio Bell Telephone Co. v. Public Utilities Commission of Ohio, 301 U.S. 292,300(1937), so that "even now we do not know the particular or evidential facts of which the [Court]... took judicial notice and on which it rested its conclusion." Id. at 302.

It is also a violation of due process for an appellate court to rely for disposition of an appeal upon factual grounds other than those relied upon by the trial court. Presnell v. Georgia, supra; Eaton v. City of Tulsa, 415 U.S. 697(1974); Cole v. Arkansas, 333 U.S. 196(1948). To the extent that the affirmance of any of petitioners' cases was affected by information outside the trial record, their due process rights were further violated.

The Court's sua sponte consultation of extra-record materials and information in the consideration of capital appeals contravenes petitioners' fundamental rights to due process of law.

B. The Right to the Effective Assistance of Counsel

The guarantee of the effective assistance of counsel is as applicable on appeal as at trial. Anders v. California, 386 U.S. 738(1967); Ross v. State, 287 So2d 372(Fla.2d DCA 1973); Davis v. State, 276 So2d 846(Fla.2d DCA 1973), aff'd 290 So2d 30(Fla.1974). This right is denied not merely by the denial of counsel but by any hampering "restrictions upon the function of counsel in defending a criminal prosecution in accord with the traditions of the adversary fact-finding process." Herring v. New York, 422 U.S. 853,857(1975). Accord: Ferguson v. Georgia, 365 U.S. 570(1961); Brooks v. Tennessee, 406 U.S. 605(1972); Geders v. United States, 425 U.S. 80(1976). In Gardner v. Florida, 428 U.S. 908,909(1976) certiorari was granted on both a Sixth and a Fourteenth Amendment question. In its decision, the Supreme Court of the United States held that "[e]ven though the defendant has no substantive right to a particular sentence within the range authorized by statute, the sentencing is a critical stage of the criminal proceeding at which he is entitled to the effective assistance of counsel."[Citing Mempa v. Rhay, 389 U.S. 128(1967) and Specht v. Patterson, 386 U.S. 605(1967)]. Gardner v. Florida, 430 U.S. 349,358(1977). Implementing Gardner, this Court has recognized that counsel must be afforded adequate time to prepare pertinent rebuttal evidence in order for a defendant to be given a meaningful "opportunity to be heard." Barclay & Dougan v. State, 362 So2d 657,658(Fla.1978). This Court's request for or receipt of confidential information, without notice to or access by petitioners and their counsel, violates the petitioners' rights because their counsel are afforded no opportunity to explain, deny, or place in context the information. The exclusion of counsel from the process of weighing such information proceeds from the:

> erroneous premise that the participation of counsel is superfluous to the process of evaluating the relevance and significance of aggravating and mitigating facts. Our belief that debate between adversaries is often essential to the truth-seeking function of trials requires us also to recognize the importance of giving counsel an opportunity to comment on facts which may influence the sentencing decision in capital cases.

Gardner v. Florida, supra, 430 U.S. at 360. On the appeal of a capital case, no less than at trial, the Sixth Amendment guarantees "the guiding hand of counsel" to a criminal defendant. Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45,57(1932).

C. The Right to Confrontation

The Sixth Amendment provides that "[i]n all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right . . . to be confronted with the witnesses against him." See generally Pointer v. Texas, 380 U.S. 400(1965); Douglas v. Alabama, 380 U.S. 415(1965).

> The primary object of the constitutional provision in question was to prevent depositions or ex parte affidavits, such as were sometimes admitted in civil cases, being used against the prisoner in lieu of a personal examination and cross-examination of the witness, in which the accused has an opportunity, not only of testing the recollection and sifting the conscience of the witness, but of compelling him to stand face to face with the jury in order that they may look at him, and judge by his demeanor upon the stand and the manner in which he gives his testimony whether he is worthy of belief.

Mattox v. United States, 156 U.S. 237, 242-243(1895). A defendant's Confrontation Clause rights are not limited to trial of the case but attach wherever evidence is admitted relevant to the issues to be adjudicated. "A leading principle that pervades the entire law of criminal procedure is that, after indictment found, nothing shall be done in the absence of the prisoner." Lewis v. United States, 146 U.S. 370, 373(1892). A defendant is entitled to confront the witnesses against him in any proceeding "after the case is called for trial which involves his substantial rights." Hopt v. Utah, 110 U.S. 574, 578(1884). See also Rogers v. United States, 422 U.S. 35, 39-40(1975). The evidence which this Court has received has never been tested by the equivalent of cross-examination, cf. Ohio v. Roberts, ___U.S.___ 100 S.Ct. 2531(1980), and is of a notoriously unreliable sort (See ¶ D. infra). While in some limited circumstances, hearsay reports might be admissible if the prosecution makes a solid factual showing of the preparer's "unavailability" as a witness at the time of trial and if, in addition, the report bears adequate "'indicia of reliability'", Mancusi v. Stubbs, 408 U.S. 204, 213(1972), in the present cases, defense counsel were unaware of the very existence of the reports that may have affected the appeals in petitioners' cases. There was no opportunity here to confront the reports themselves and the consequences of this Court's request or receipt of the reports, let alone the preparers of the reports.

D. The Eighth Amendment Right to Reliability in Capital Sentencing

In Woodson v. North Carolina, 428 U.S. 280, 305(1976) the Supreme Court recognized that, under the Eighth Amendment "death is a punishment different from all other sanctions in kind rather than in degree." "[T]his qualitative difference between death and other penalities calls for a greater degree of reliability when the death sentence is imposed." Lockett v. Ohio, 438 U.S. 586, 604(1978). Accordingly, > [t]o insure that the death penalty is indeed imposed on the basis of 'reason rather than caprice or emotion,' we have invalidated procedural rules that tended to diminish the reliability of the sentencing determination. The same reasoning must apply to rules that diminish the reliability of the guilt determination. (Footnote omitted). Beck v. Alabama, ___ U.S. ___, 100 S.Ct. 2382, 2389-90 (1980).

It is hard to conceive of evidence more fraught with danger when considered ex parte than the subjective psychiatric/psychological/correctional reports received by this Court, unsubjected to professional explanation and adversarial cross-examination. Addington v. Texas, 441 U.S. 418(1979); Smith v. Estelle, 602 F.2d 694(5th Cir.1979), cert. granted, 100 S.Ct. 1311(1980). See generally, Ennis & Litwack, Psychiatry and the Presumption of Expertise: Flipping Coins in the Courtroom, 62 Calif. L. Rev. 693(1974). As the Supreme Court of the United States stated in Kent v. United States, 383 U.S. 541, 563(1966):

> [T]here is no irrebutable presumption of accuracy attached to staff reports. If a decision on [the sentence of life or death] . . . is 'critically important' it is equally of 'critical importance' that the material submitted to the judge . . . be subjected, within reasonable > limits . . . to examination, criticism and refutation.

The risk that an appellant may be the victim of inaccurate information is precisely the same here as in Gardner. In a case where a mistake may send an appellant to his electrocution, the risk is simply not a constitutionally acceptable one:

> From the point of view of the defendant [the penalty of death] is different in both its severity and its finality. From the point of view of society, the action of the sovereign in taking the life of one of its citizens also differs dramatically from any other legitimate state action. It is of vital importance to the defendant and to the community that any decision to impose the death sentence be, and appear to be, based on reason rather than caprice or emotion.

Id. at 357-358. See also Godfrey v. Georgia, ___U.S.___, 64 L.Ed. 2d 398, 409(1980). In the words of Mr. Justice Overton, "often secrecy is considered the opposite of credibility," Forbes v. Earle, 298 So2d 1, 4(Fla. 1974).

E. The Eighth Amendment Right to Proportionality in Capital Sentencing

The Eighth Amendment requires that the death penalty be applied in accordance with a rational and regular sentencing procedure which takes into account both the nature of the crime and the culpability of the individual offender. Woodson v. North Carolina, 428 U.S. 280, 303(1976). The constitutionality of Florida's capital punishment statute was upheld in 1976 on the explicit assumption that review in this Court would be satisfactory to guard against capricious and disproportionate infliction of the death penalty:

> [M]eaningful appellate review of each . . . [death] sentence is made possible, and the Supreme Court of Florida . . . considers its function to be to '[guarantee] that the [aggravating and mitigating] reasons present in one case will reach a similar result to that reached under similar circumstances in another case.... in light of the other decisions and determine whether or not the punishment is too great'. State v. Dixon, 283 So2d 1, 10(1973).

Proffitt v. Florida, 428 U.S. 242, 251(1976). The secret use of sentencing evidence by this Court "creates the risk that the death penalty will be imposed in spite of factors which may call for a less severe penalty. When the choice is between life and death, that risk is unacceptable and incompatible with the commands of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments." Lockett v. Ohio, 438 U.S. 586, 605(1978). Accord: Beck v. Alabama, ___U.S.___, 100 S.Ct. 2382, 2389(1980).

The sua sponte request and receipt of evidence by this Court makes it impossible to assure either that the Court's general appellate function or the Court's role as the third step in the "trifurcated" sentencing process will not result in the capricious or disproportionate imposition of the death penalty. The formal record on the basis of which the death sentence is imposed will necessarily be incomplete, with parts of it invisible to counsel, to the trial courts, to the federal courts, and to this Court itself as Justices change over time. This is a constitutional defect, for the handling and treatment of confidential sentencing information in a death case is not simply a matter of this Court's discretion. In Gardner v. Florida, supra, the State argued that "trial judges can be trusted to exercise their discretion in a responsible manner, even though they may base their decisions on secret information." 430 U.S. at 360. The Court expressly rejected this argument as "clearly foreclosed," ibid., by Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238(1972) and "inconsistent with the basis upon which the Florida capital-sentencing procedure was upheld, Proffitt v. Florida, 428 U.S. at 254," id. at 360 n. 11. The Court recognized an Eighth Amendment right to a full and complete record in order to insure that the death penalty is applied proportionately and non-arbitrarily:

> Since the State must administer its capital sentencing procedures with an even hand, see Proffitt v. Florida, 428 U.S. at 250, it is important that the record on appeal disclose to the reviewing court the considerations > which motivated the death sentence in every case in which it is imposed. Without full disclosure of the basis for the death sentence, the Florida capital-sentencing procedure would be subject to the defects which resulted in the holding of unconstitutionality in Furman v. Georgia. Gardner v. Florida, supra, 430 U.S. at 361 (footnote omitted).

Further, where this Court opens itself to a major category or kind of information in some cases, but not others, proportionality is precluded.

Where neither the trial records nor this Court's decisions reflect accurately all of the information before the court in deciding capital cases, trial and appellate counsel, trial judges, and federal courts on review are deprived of the necessary basis on which to compare cases and insure that consistent standards are being applied in capital sentencing.

The receipt by this Court of different information in different cases -- information which was not before the trial jury or judge -- has eviscerated the system of checks and balances the trifurcated Florida death penalty structure was designed to guarantee. See Proffitt v. Florida, supra; Miller v. State, 332 So2d 65(Fla. 1976); Messer v. State, 330 So2d 137 (Fla. 1976). It has destroyed the statewide "consistency, fairness, and rationality in the evenhanded operation of the state law" which the Supreme Court of the United States believed to be guaranteed by the Florida capital sentencing procedure when it found that procedure facially constitutional in Proffitt v. Florida, supra, 428 U.S. at 260. The Court's practice thus has prejudiced all capital appellants, both those for whom information may have been received and those for whom it was not.

F. The Right Against Self-Incrimination and the Right of the Assistance of Counsel in Deciding Whether to Exercise that Right

An interview with correctional employees or mental health professionals who are obtaining information from an inmate is fundamentally unlike a court-ordered psychiatric examination after a defendant has himself put his sanity in issue. In the latter case, the defendant may be deemed to have waived the right to object to such an interview. In the former case, however, the Fifth Circuit has recently held that the State may not interview an inmate without notice and waiver of his rights, when the interview will subsequently be admitted in a capital sentencing proceeding, because the inmate has a Fifth Amendment right to refuse to participate in the interview and a Sixth Amendment right to consult with his counsel concerning whether to be interviewed. Smith v. Estelle, 602 F.2d 694(5th Cir. 1979), cert. granted, 100 S.Ct. 1311(1980).

It appears clear that in the present cases, as in Smith, the death row prisoners were not told that the information derived from interviews conducted by correctional employees or mental health professionals would be forwarded to this Court, nor were they told that they had a right to refuse to participate in the interviews. See Smith v. Estelle, supra at 602 F.2d 707-708. If, under the Fifth Amendment, "a defendant may not be compelled to speak to a psychiatrist who can use his statements against him at the sentencing phase of a capital trial." Smith v. Estelle, supra, 602 F.2d at 708, then that right was completely negated here.

Furthermore, petitioners were denied the advice of counsel at a critical stage of the sentencing proceedings in their cases. For, while an attorney may have no right to be present with an inmate during an interview by a psychiatrist, see United States v. Cohen, 530 F.2d 43(5th Cir.1976), the attorney has a highly important role in assisting the inmate to decide whether the inmate should waive his Fifth Amendment rights:

> This is a vitally important decision, literally a life or death matter. It is a difficult decision even for an attorney; it requires a knowledge of what other evidence is available, of the particular psychiatrist's biases and predilections, of possible alternative strategies at the sentencing hearing. For a lay defendant, who is likely to have no idea of the vagaries of expert testimony and its possible role in a capital trial, and who may well find it difficult to understand, even if he is told, whether a psychiatrist is examining his competence, his sanity, his long-term > dangerousness for purposes of sentencing, his short-term dangerousness for purposes of civil commitment, his mental health for purposes of treatment, or some other thing, it is a hopelessly difficult decision. There is no reason to force the defendant to make it without 'the guiding hand of counsel' Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45, 57, 53 S.Ct. 55, 77 L.Ed. 158(1933).

Smith v. Estelle, supra, 602 F.2d at 708-709. See also Brewer v. Williams, 430 U.S. 387, 398(1977). These petitioners have been deprived of the advice of counsel as to their decisions whether to put their lives in the hands of prison personnel or other agents of the State. "The guiding hand of counsel is needed lest the unwary concede that which only bewilderment or ignorance could justify or pay a penalty which is greater than the law of the State exacts for the offense which they in fact and in law committed." Tomkins v. Missouri, 323 U.S. 485,489 (1945). Just as "a prisoner is not 'to be made the deluded instrument of his own conviction,' 2 Hawkins, Pleas of the Crown(8th ed. 1824),595," Culombe v. Connecticut, 367 U.S. 568, 581(1961)(opinion of Mr. Justice Frankfurter), neither may he be made the deluded instrument of his own execution.

G. Conclusion

The practice of this Court of requesting or receiving undisclosed information in capital cases has infected and prejudicially skewed its review of every death sentence. Under the Florida death penalty scheme, the ultimate safeguard for insuring that the process of imposing death sentences is fair, reliable and even-handed is the appellate review required to be provided by this Court. All capital appellants have suffered from this Court's practice of securing secret information. The capital sentencing process in Florida has been distorted from the form in which it was approved by the Supreme Court of the United States, and has become tainted at its highest and most important judicial level.

When the Court's decision is one involving the ultimate penalty of death, the Constitution cannot tolerate anything short of full notice and disclosure of any and all facts being fed into the life and death equation. One of the tripartite pillars of the trifurcated sentencing process of Florida has become cracked.

V.

PRAYER FOR RELIEF

Based upon the foregoing, petitioners respectfully request their unconstitutional sentences of death be vacated and that the Court grant such other relief as may be deemed proper.

MEMO TO HE FILE

August 29, 1975

Michael E. Provence CO# 175442

On 8/29/75 I was notified by Mr. Boone in our Bradenton office that the Florida Supreme Court had ordered the Clerk of the Manatee County Circuit Court to submit a copy of the PSI to the Court in this case. From reviewing this file it appears that Provence was convicted by jury of Murder In The First Degree on 10/24/74 and it appears that the jury recommended a sentence of Life. Judge Gilbert A. Smith ordered a PSI (contrary to 948.01(a)F.S.) and after it was submitted, Judge Smith sentenced this individual to Death. A review of the report indicates that Officer Thomas S. McCall might have gotten emotionally involved in his report but in the Analysis he made a recommendation that Provence be sentenced to Death. It is believed that Provence is appealing the conviction as well as the sentence and therefore the Supreme Court has asked for a copy of the PSI. The Clerk of the Circuit Court was trying to obtain a copy of the PSI from Mr. Boone who was reluctant to cooperate, to the degree that the Clerk was trying to obtain a court order. I asked Mr. Boone to discuss this with Judge Smith who had no objections to Mr. Boone supplying the Clerk with a copy of the factual part of the PSI but explicitly instructed him not to supply the Clerk with a copy of the Confidential section.

I have specifically instructed Mr. Boone and Mr. Otts to discuss this situation with Judge Smith, in hopes that no further request for PSI's on possible death cases be ordered. Besides being contrary to law, this is grossly unfair to our staff and the officer can be blamed for the Judge's decision, even though the Court will accept the blame themselves. Mr. Otts believes that Judge Smith will understand our problem and cooperate.

IN THE SUPREME COURT OF FLORIDA

CHARLES DWIGHT MESSER,	:
Appellant,	:
v.	:	CASE NO. 49,780
STATE OF FLORIDA,	:
Appellee.	:

PETITION FOR REHEARING

Petitioner, CHARLES DWIGHT MESSER, by his undersigned counsel, hereby petitions this Court pursuant to Florida Appellate Rule 3.14 to grant rehearing on the issues raise in this appeal, and petitioner respectfully suggests that this Court omitted or neglected to fully consider the following:

A. Defendant's Pending Motion To Clarify And The Failure Of The Trial Court To Provide The Pre-Sentence Investigation Report.

On June 16, 1977, this Court directed the trial judge below to file a response stating whether he imposed the death sentence in consideration of any information not known to appellant. This Court also directed the trial judge to furnish copies of his response along with copies of any sentencing information to the Court and both counsel for the state and counsel for appellant. This directive was issued by this Court pursuant to Gardner v. Florida, 430 U.S. 349 (1977).

On September 26, 1977 the trial judge issued his response stating twice that he had considered a pre-sentence investigation report and further stating that he was ordering the Clerk of the Court to send copies of that report along with copies of psychiatric and psychological reports to this Court. Upon receipt of the trial judge's response, counsel for appellant timely filed, on October 3, 1977, a motion in this Court requesting that the trial judge be required to clarify his response to indicate whether these reports had been furnished to appellant or his trial counsel. This was necessary because although the trial judge had indicated that he saw a pre-sentence investigation report, he did not state whether that report had been furnished to the defendant or trial counsel. As of this date, counsel for appellant has received no reponse to his motion, has received no response from the trial judge, and no copies of the reports have been filed in this Court or furnished to counsel for appellant.

Pursuant to Florida Appellate Rule 3.9, counsel for appellant had the right to believe that the proceedings in this cause were suspended until his motion was disposed of or at the very least, until this Court had reviewed the reports and determined whether there had been a violation under Gardner, supra. However, on April 26, 1979, this Court issued its opinion affirming appellant's conviction with no mention, whatsoever, of the possible Gardner violation. Counsel for appellant, upon receiving this opinion, checked his file and then checked this Court's file to determine what action, if any, had been taken pursuant to his motion. Upon reviewing this Court's file, counsel for appellant could find no action taken on his motion, no pre-sentence investigation or psychiatrical reports, and by checking the Clerk's docket, could find no indication that any such reports had been furnished to the Court. This Court's records do contain a letter from someone stating that they had no pre-sentence investigation report on appellant. This, however, does not mean that such a report was not prepared and certainly does not explain the trial judge's emphatic response that he had reviewed such a report. Appellant would contend that such facts warrant a full hearing at the trial level to determine exactly what happened to the pre-sentence investigation report and to determine exactly what the trial judge considered at sentencing that was not furnished to appellant or his trial counsel. Since Gardner, supra, seems to require not only a disclosure of such a pre-sentence investigation report but also a review of that report by this Court, it is essential that the report be provided as ordered by the trial judge. Until a determination has been made by the trial court on this matter, all proceedings in this case should be stayed and this Court should withdraw its opinion of April 26, 1978, pending a full review of the possible Gardner violation.

B. Secret Psychological Report Ordered By This Court

It must also be noted here in appellant's petition for rehearing that while reviewing this Court's record on appeal in this case, counsel for appellant found a copy of a letter from this Court to the Department of Offender Rehabilitation requesting a copy of the latest psychological report pertaining to the appellant. No copy of this letter was ever furnished to counsel for appellant. Counsel for appellant is aware that the Florida State Prison conducts psychological screening reports on all new inmates. Counsel for appellant also has personal knowledge that in other death cases pending before this Court, that this Court has requested and received such psychological reports without appellate counsel being notified. Upon finding a copy of this letter in the Court file, counsel for appellant attempted to determine if this Court had received such a report but counsel was informed that after the Gardner decision, all death cases were "purged" of such

Under these circumstances, counsel for appellant would request that this Court conduct a full hearing of its own to determine whether or not the psychological screening report was received and the date on which it was received by this Court, when and under whose direction that report was destroyed, and whether or not that report was read and considered by any members of this Court.

Counsel for appellant feels that he must raise this question in his petition for rehearing in order to avoid any waiver of his client's rights. It is apparant, however, that this Court's actions have raised a question that must be resolved pursuant to Gardner, supra, to determine whether the death sentence was imposed on appellant, at least in part, on the basis of a record containing information of which he had no knowledge or opportunity to deny or explain.

It is clear that any secret report is not permissible in death penalty proceedings and violates the process which the defendant is due in such cases. See Gardner, supra, at page 360. Review by this Court is clearly part of the procedure employed in this state for determining which persons receive the death penalty. As noted by Justice White in his concurrence Gardner, supra, at 364:

> "A procedure for selecting people for the death penalty which permits consideration of such secret information relevent to the 'character and record of the individual offender,' . . . [Woodson v. North Carolina, 428 U.S. at 304], fails to meet the 'need for reliability in the determination that death is the appropriate punishment' which the Court indicated was required in Woodson, supra, at 305."

It should also be noted that if psychological reports were before the Court in any other cases then supra, at 361:

> "Since the state must administer its capital sentencing procedures with an even hand, see Proffit v. Florida, 428 U.S., at 250, it is important that the record on appeal disclosed to the reviewing court the considerations which motivated the death sentence in every case in which it is imposed. Without full disclosure of the basis for the death sentence, the Florida Capitol Sentencing Procedure would be subject to the defects which resulted in the holding of unconstitutionality in Furman v. Georgia."

C. Allowing Opinion Which Reaches The Ultimate Issue Being Determined To Be Offered By Jury To Prosecutor.

Concerning this Court's opinion filed on April 26, 1977, in the above styled cause, counsel for appellant would respectfully point out that by determing that the State Attorney could give his opinion as to aggravating and mitigating circumstances present, this Court not only failed to point out what rule of evidence allowed such testimony, it also failed to recognize that by making such a ruling it was overturning long-standing case law on the subject. As recently as this year, the Second District Court of Appeal had pointed out in Mills v. State, 367 So.2d 1068, 1069 (Fla. 2nd DCA, 1979) that:

> "A non-expert witness may not express opinions or conclusions which the jury could draw from the facts to which he had testified."

Moreover, the court in Mills pointed out that such error was clearly reversible because the opinion dealt with the ultimate issue to be decided.

In the sentencing portion of a death case, the ultimate issue to be determined by the jury is what aggravating and mitigating circumstances exist and whether or not the aggravating circumstances outweigh the mitigating circumstances. By allowing the State Attorney's opinion testimony on the ultimate issue to be decided this Court has either: (1) overruled the long-standing case law pertaining to such testimony or (2) determined that error which would otherwise be reversible in other types of criminal cases is not reversible in a death case.

D. Allowing Testimony To Negate Mitigating Factors.

In determining that it was proper for the State Attorney to take the stand and testify at the second sentencing hearing, this Court stated at page three of its opinion:

> "The state sought to present this testimony in order to counter any inference, unfavorable to the state's case on this issue of sentence, that the jury might draw from being informed of the final disposition of the charges against the accomplice. The testimony also tended to negate various statutory mitigating circumstances. We hold that the state attorney's testimony was relevent for these purposes and was properly admitted." (emphasis added)

After finding that it was proper for the State Attorney to testify in order to negate various mitigating circumstances, this Court goes on to find at page three:

> "We find further from the record that there was no evidence tending to establish the existence of any mitigating factors. The sentence of death was proper."

Counsel for appellant is in a quandary as to why, if there were no mitigating factors, would the State Attorney be allowed to testify to negate them. On the other hand, if the State Attorney had to be allowed to testify to negate mitigating factors, then evidence of mitigating factors must have been present that the jury could have considered. It appears as if the decision allows the State to have its cake and eat it too. The problem can be resolved in one of two ways, either by finding that no mitigating factors existed, thus requiring a new sentencing proceeding wherein the State Attorney would be prohibited from testfying, or, in the alternative, by finding that mitigating factors did exist, in which case a new sentencing hearing is required based on the fact that this Court had ruled out but all two of the aggravating factors argued below. See Elledge v. State, 346 So.2d 998 (Fla. 1977).

The State Attorney's testimony raises an additional problem when this Court allows the State to negate mitigating factors that the Court finds do not exist. If this Court allows its decision to stand, the state will hereafter be allowed to argue at sentencing proceedings the absence of mitigating factors. Such a ruling directly conflicts with this Court's decision in Mikenas v. State, 367 So.2d 606 (Fla. 1978). In that decision, this Court held that it was error for the trial judge to consider a non-statutory aggravating circumstance which was the antithesis of a mitigating circumstance. In so doing, this Court declared that it was improper to consider the lack of a mitigating circumstance as an aggravating circumstance. In this instant case, to allow the State to negate mitigating factors which this Court determined do not exist, is the same as allowing the State to argue the lack of mitigating factors as an aggravating factor. This is in direct conflict with Mikenas.

E. Erroneous Resolution Of Aggravating/Mitigating Issues.

Finally, counsel for appellant would urge that this Court's elimination of all but two aggravating circumstances requires that appellant be remanded to trial court for a new sentencing proceeding. Obviously, the State and this Court believe that there was sufficient evidence of mitigating factors present as shown by the fact that the State was permitted to present the State Attorney's testimony to negate those factors. Indeed, the testimony of Dr. McMahon, alone, was sufficient to give the jury reason to find one mitigating circumstance, that of impairment of appellant's capacity to appreciate the criminality of his conduct. See Shue v. State, 366 So.2d 387 (Fla. 1978). This Court cannot stand as the trier of fact and determine that the sentencing jury did not consider Dr. McMahon's testimony of appellant's mental state as establishing a mitigating factor to be wieghted against the aggravating factors presented, since no specific findings were returned by the jury. As pointed out by this Court in Shue v. State, supra:

> "It is impossible to say that there was no reasonable basis for the jury to have concluded that some mitigating circumstances existed sufficient to outweight the aggravating circumstances."

Furthermore, as the United States Supreme Court has pointed out in Lockett v. Ohio, ___ U.S. ___, 98 S.Ct. ___, 57 L.Ed.2d 973, 990 (1978):

> . . . "The Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments require that the sentencer, in all but the rarest kind of capital case, not be precluded from considering as a mitigating factor, any aspect of a defendant's character or record and any of the circumstances of the offense that the defendant proffers as a basis for a sentence less than death."

In the instant case it is entirely possible that the jury considered at least one mitigating circumstance to be weighted against the several aggravating circumstances presented by the State because evidence of such a mitigating factor was presented to them. Since this Court has corrected the trial court to show that only two aggravating factors could have existed, the aggravating and mitigating factors must now be placed back before the jury to determine if the mitigating factors now outweight the aggravating.

WHEREFORE, appellant prays this Court will grant re-hearing in this case, require hearings on the Gardner issues presented, and remand this case for a new sentencing proceeding in accordance with this Court's findings relating to the aggravating and mitigating circumstances present.

Respectfully submitted,

Special Difficulties Nature of sentence

PSYCHOLOGICAL OBSERVATIONS:

Subject's general attire appeared slightly below average. It was difficult to elicit spontaneous conversation from Meeks and most of his answers were extremely short. Subject possessed an optimistic attitude regarding his appeal and hoped to be back into the free world in a relatively short period of time. Discreet behavioral tremors were detected when discussing the crime which included leg shaking, hand wringing, and knuckle cracking. No delusional material, loose associations or hallucinatory imagery was elicited. He was well oriented as to time, place, and person and psychopathology was ruled out. His intellectual capacity, however, and ability to abstract as a result of that capacity was felt to be inferior. Rapport was felt to be genuine.

Meeks presents himself as a very inadequate and easily led individual. As indicated above his intellectual capacity is considered to be inferior and it seems as though he lacks ability to appropriately assess alternatives in a normal manner. Subject claimed during the interview to have been committed to the University of Jackson Mississippi Mental Ward in 1969 because he was considered to be aggressive by others in his community in Darling, Mississippi. He related a past juvenile aggressive background including overt aggressive acts toward his family when he was younger. His father died when subject was three and he was raised mainly by his mother. There are six other siblings in the family, three boys and three girls. Subject further related however that in the past four or five years he has not been as aggressive as he had prior to that time.

He reflects an unstable job history stating that when he was eighteen he left home to come South for fruit picking and once he arrived in Florida he held odd jobs such as working at a sawmill, plumbers helper, as well as the fruit picking business. His long range goals, if ever released to the free world again are to obtain a job as a plumbers helper, get married and raise a family.

RECOMMENDATIONS:

Meeks' institutional adjustment will most likely be determined by those peers whom he associates with. Meeks is the type of individual wo can easily be led into practically any type of activity and therefore, in light of the mileau at Florida State Prison, aggressive behaviors could certainly not be ruled out. His prognosis remains guarded. –

RE: MARK MIKENAS

STATE OF FLORIDA

CASE NO. 49,928

Reference is made to your letter of January 17, 1977, in response to my motion for copy of presentence investigation report. In response to my motion, your letter says, "Moot, none prepared".

I am not urging the Court to consider the presentence investigation report, but I do note that it was on its own initiative, that the Court ordered the Parole and Probation Commission to produce the report. Thus, as an officer of the Court, I bring to your attention that there was, in fact, a presentence investigation report prepared in this case by an officer of the Florida Parole and Probation Office in Tampa. Indeed, in making his Findings of Fact, the trial judge considered the presentence investigation (Record, page 75, paragraph one).

If the report is transmitted to you as ordered by the Court, I request that consideration be given to my motion for a copy of the report.

Sincerely,

Dear Mr. White:

This is in response to your request for a copy of the Psychiatric evaluation on the above named subject.

I am sorry not to have responded to your request sooner, but complications has arisen concerning this request.

Upon reviewing Mr. Lewis' Institutional File, it was learned that no recent Psychiatric Evaluation was available so an appointment was scheduled for an evaluation to be completed. Mr. Lewis, after consulting with his legal council, has refused to cooperate in the preparation of this evaluation.

Upon his receipt into our custody, a Psychological Screening Report was prepared on Mr. Lewis. Our Institutional Psychologist is preparing a review and up-date to this report which will be forwarded to your office as soon as it is completed. Meanwhile, I am attaching a copy of the original report for your use.

I trust this information will be of use to you. If we can further assist in this case, please advise.

v.	:	CASE NO. 51,699
STATE OF FLORIDA,	:

MOTION TO INSPECT AND COPY
PSYCHOLOGICAL SCREENING REPORT AND PRESENTENCE INVESTIGATION REPORT

Appellant, PAUL EDWARD MAGILL, requests this Honorable Court to enter an order authorizing appellant's counsel to inspect the appellant's presentence investigation report and appellant's Psychological Screening Report, which are before this Court pursuant to its order of May 15, 1978, and in support of said motion would state:

1. During oral argument in this cause on June 21, 1978, Chief Justice Overton referred to the contents of a Psychological Screening Report on appellant prepared by the Department of Offender Rehabilitation, which was appended to the Court's copy of the presentence investigation report. This document is before this Court and bears upon its consideration of the presence of mitigating circumstances in appellant's case. Neither appellant nor his undersigned counsel have been furnished with a copy of that report. After oral argument, undersigned counsel requested that the Clerk's Office provide her with a copy of that report, but the Chief Deputy Clerk, Bernice Smilgin, declined to do so without order of this Court. Appellant submits that the considerations of Gardner v. Florida, 51 L.Ed.2d 393 (1977) require that appellant's counsel be provided with a copy of this Psychological Screening Report.

2. Appellant also requests this Court to enter an order authorizing appellant's undersigned counsel to inspect and copy all portions of the appellant's presentence investigation report, which this Court ordered included in the record of this case on May 15, 1978. Although undersigned counsel has been furnished with a copy of what purports to be the presentence investigation report in appellant's case, appellant's counsel has not had an opportunity to determine if that document is identical to what has been filed before this Court. Appellant submits that his counsel is entitled to inspect and copy all portions of all reports which have been filed under the heading of "presentence investigation report" with this Court.

WHEREFORE, appellant prays this Court to enter an order authorizing appellant's undersigned counsel to inspect and copy all portions of the appellant's presentence investigative report and the Psychological Screening Report, which have been made a part of the record on appeal in this case.

Respectfully submitted,

Margaret Good

PSYCHOLOGICAL OBSERVATIONS:

The subject, Paul Edward Magill, #059128, is an eighteen year old caucasian male currently sentenced to death for Murdering the cashier in a convenience store after Robbing and Raping her. The subject states this offense was precipitated by an argument with his mother in December of 1976. The subject reports that he is being raised by his mother after the death of his father, a retired Air Force colonel.

This is not the subject's first experience with legal troubles as he has also been charged with indecent exposure, generally occurring in public places to members of the opposite sex. It was noted that the target individuals were all of equal age.

When examined the subject was in good contact with reality, with no observable signs of a mental or thought disorder. Memory of near and distant events was clear and within normal limits. The subject admitted his guilt in this offense, but attributed it to increased pressure at home resulting in some sort of seizure as the subject described it.

Psychometrics reveal considerable signs of extremely impulsive behavior, coupled with a psychopathic-anti-social personality character. The subject shows very limited control in stressful situations. Results were negative for any form of psychosis at this testing.

RECOMMENDATIONS:

Presently, the subject does not appear to be in much stress, however, should these feelings develope the subject will quite possibly become suicidal. Precautions shall be routinely maintained by monitoring behavior for regression.

RESPONSE

Comes now, Florida Parole and Probation Commission, and makes this Response to this Court's Order of August 16, 1979 in the above-styled cause.

With all due respect, the Florida Parole and Probation Commission is unable to comply with this Court's Order because it is not the custodian of the documents sought by the Court. All Pre-Sentence Investigations are under the control and custody of the Florida Department of Corrections. See Section 20.315 (22) F.S. Further, the Florida Parole and Probation Commission no longer conducts Pre-Sentence Investigations. That function is also now to the Department of Corrections. See Section 945.25; 945.10 F.S.

In accordance with a request made by the Clerk of the Court, the Florida Parole and Probation Commission is forwarding this Court's Order in the above-styled cause to the Department of Corrections.

Re: Freddie Lee Hall, #022762
Case No. 54,423

Dear Mr. White:

In response to the order dated September 28, 1979, it has been determined that no Presentence Investigation was conducted for either of this individual's death sentences.

Mr. Hall was convicted in the Circuit Court for Lake County on June 1, 1978, for MURDER IN THE FIRST DEGREE, and sentenced to death by Judge John W. Booth. Mr. Hall was further convicted in the Circuit Court for Putnam County on June 23, 1978, also for MURDER IN THE FIRST DEGREE and was sentenced to death by the same Judge Booth. No Presentence Investigation was requested on either of these offenses.

Mr. Hall was convicted on August 30, 1978, in the Circuit Court for Pasco County for the offense of ATTEMPTED MURDER IN THE FIRST DEGREE and was sentenced to 30 years in prison to run consecutive with any other sentences by Judge Wayne L. Cobb. Judge Cobb had requested a Presentence Investigation on July 24, 1978, and this was available to him at the time he imposed the prison sentence but was not available to Judge Booth on the previous sentences.

Please advise if we may be of any further assistance to you in this matter.

AFFIDAVIT

LEON COUNTY

I, LOUIS G. CARRES, first having been duly cautioned and sworn state the following:

On September 13, 1977, I personally reviewed certain inmate files maintained by the Department of Offender Rehabilitation (now Department of Corrections) at it's central office in Tallahassee, Florida. At that time and place I personally observed three (3) letters from the Supreme Court of Florida requesting that the Department of Offender Rehabilitation forward to the Court the latest psychiatric evaluation on three (3) inmates who were on death row to wit: (1) Robert Fieldmore Lewis; (2) Rocco Surace; and (3) Anthony Antone. The letter from the Supreme Court of Florida pertaining to Mr. Lewis was dated August 4, 1977. The letter from the Supreme Court of Florida pertaining to Mr. Surace was dated February 10, 1977. The letter from the Supreme Court of Florida pertaining to Mr. Antone was dated March 4, 1977. In reviewing these three (3) letters I noted there was no indication on them that counsel for the applicable inmate-appellant had been advised of the Court's request by copy thereof.

Before me this date personally appeared Louis G. Carres, who having been duly sworn, deposes and says that the above information is true and correct to the best of his knowledge and belief.

Justices saw 'confidential' psychological profiles of death row inmates

By KELLY SCOTT
St. Petersburg Times Staff Writer

TALLAHASSEE — Without the knowledge of defense attorneys, the Florida Supreme Court obtained psychological profiles of at least 20 men who were waiting on death row for the court to review their death sentences.

The practice apparently violated a U.S. Supreme Court decision giving all defendants a constitutional right to see and challenge any information used in determining their sentences.

"In some cases, we ended up with information we were not supposed to see," Justice Ben F. Overton conceded in an interview with The St. Petersburg Times.

But he said the court got the reports "inadvertently" and denied that justices actually used the reports in deciding whether the men should be given life in prison instead of death in the electric chair.

THE PROFILES were written by a psychologist in the State Department of Corrections after interviews and tests of the condemned men. The inmates were never told that the information might be used by the Supreme Court as it decided whether to uphold or overturn their sentences.

Overton, who was chief justice when the court obtained the reports, said the court had asked the Corrections Department for pre-sentence reports, but sometimes received reports compiled after the sentencings.

Court records show, however, that the court specifically asked for the psychological profiles.

The reports were later removed from the court file, but not before some of the justices saw them.

"The appellate process was compromised," said Bruce Rogo, a professor of law at Nova University who represents a death row inmate. "It was error to go outside the record, especially without notifying opposing lawyers. It was wrong for that to happen. They have admitted that by stopping the practice."

Another defense lawyer, Ted Mack of Tallahassee, has already raised the issue with the court. On behalf of convicted killer Charles Dwight Messer, Mack is seeking a hearing to determine whether the court received a psychological report on Messer, whether any justices read it and when it was destroyed.

"I think there's a very serious legal and ethical question that the Supreme Court is going to have to answer to," Mack said in a recent interview.

It's possible that some of the defendants whose profiles were obtained by the court will get new sentencing hearings because of the mistake. The mistake will not affect the convictions themselves.

THOUGH SOME OF THE justices remembered looking at the reports, all of them said the reports had no effect on their decisions.

Alan Sundberg, who became chief justice last month, figures he read the reports. "I don't have any independent recollection," he said. "I'm sure I did."

Asked if he thought it was appropriate for him to read them, Sundberg said, "If you ask if it influenced my decision, no, I don't think it did. I'm more concerned about that transcript, what the record says . . . I don't believe I was compromised, if that's your bottom line."

Justice Arthur England said he remembers seeing the reports in the files under a distinctive pink cover sheet, but he said he did not read them. "The answer to your question is it would be pretty outrageous if we considered something like that, because it's not part of the record. And we haven't," England said.

"I might have seen one," said Justice James C. Adkins. "I would have casually overlooked it if I did. I've never read one. I wouldn't pay any attention to it. I would never request anything like that. I'm just not one of them that does that, requests anything further. I don't think we should."

Joseph W. Hatchett, who left the court in 1979 to become a federal appeals judge, would not comment. "You have to understand, there could be litigation on that matter, and I was a member of the court at the time," Hatchett said.

Justice Joseph A. Boyd said, "The only time we would do it (order the reports) would be if the trial record indicated there was some reason to."

BOYD SAID HE did not know that some attorneys were not aware their clients were being psychologically evaluated for the Supreme Court's review. "If the lawyer didn't get notified, I think that's very interesting. The court would like to know why that happened," Boyd said.

Even if justices did read the psychological reports, Justice Overton said, they wouldn't have considered them in determining the appropriateness of the sentence. "Judges are trained to make their consideration based solely on what is admissible," Overton said.

Fred Karl, the seventh member of the court when the reports were being received, could not be contacted.

Records of the Supreme Court and the Corrections Department show that 19 psychological reports on condemned murderers were sent to the court between November 1978 and May 1978. A psychological report on death row inmate Douglas Ray Meeks was requested and sent to the court as early as March 1978. Gov. Bob Graham signed a death warrant for Meeks on Jan. 9, 1980, but Meeks won a stay of execution.

Most of the men are still on death row, but the Supreme Court granted new sentencings or actually reduced the sentences to life for a few of the men. Among the cases are these:

- Carl Ray Songer, convicted of murdering a Florida Highway Patrol trooper in Citrus County in 1973 after escaping from an Oklahoma prison.

- Anthony Antone, convicted in the 1978 murder of Tampa policeman Richard Cloud.

- Arthur F. Goode III, convicted of killing an 11-year-old boy from Falls Church, Va. and a 3-year-old boy from Cape Coral.

- Daniel Morris Thomas, twice sentenced to death for his role as leader of the ski-mask gang, which terrorized towns in Central Florida in late 1975 and early 1976.

A PSYCHOLOGICAL REPORT was also requested and received on Jesse Lamar Hall, who was convicted in Pinellas County in 1976 of the murder of two Palm Harbor teenagers. Hall's conviction was reversed by the Florida Supreme Court late last year. Before a retrial, Hall pleaded no contest to murder and was sentenced to life in prison.

The requests for the reports apparently stopped in mid-1978, after an exchange between a defense attorney and Overton during oral arguments in the Paul McGill case.

McGill, 18, had been convicted and sentenced to death for robbing, raping and murdering a young female convenience-store clerk near Ocala. On appeal, Overton asked an assistant attorney general about McGill's reactions under stress and his suicidal tendencies.

"We have a copy of a psychological screening report and that screening report says in part that he feels very limited control in stressful situations . . . and then also shows that he will become possibly suicidal," Overton said during the hearing.

Margaret Good, a Tallahassee public defender who was arguing McGill's case, told the justices she didn't have a copy of the report and didn't know it was part of the record in the case.

The next day she filed a motion to get a copy, and the court gave her one. But the same day, Ms. Good received a letter from Court Clerk Sid White stating that the psychological report had been "stricken" from the case.

Overton said he recalls that he was the one who discovered that the reports were in the files, but he does not recall whether it was because of the McGill case.

OVERTON SAID THE reports, including the one in the McGill case, were obtained by mistake during the court's effort to fulfill the edict of the U.S. Supreme Court in the case of Gardner vs. Florida.

Daniel Wilbur Gardner was convicted and sentenced to death for the stabbing murder of his wife in Citrus County. But the U.S. Supreme Court, while upholding the conviction, overturned the death sentence because the judge considered a "confidential" portion of a presentence report, which Gardner's attorneys had not been permitted to see.

The U.S. Supreme Court said Gardner was denied due process of law because he could not deny or explain information in the report before he was sentenced to death. The Florida Supreme Court had said that the practice was constitutional.

Gardner was resentenced to life in prison.

After the U.S. Supreme Court's ruling, Overton said, the Florida Supreme Court made a special effort to seek any information the trial judge had when he sentenced a

'In some cases, we ended up with information we were not supposed to see.'

— Justice Ben F. Overton

convicted man to death.

For example, a "Gardner order" form was printed and sent to each trial judge who sentenced a convicted man to death. The order asks the judge to return a sworn statement saying whether he or she considered any information that the defendant or his defense attorney didn't know about.

ANOTHER PART OF THE court's effort, Overton said, was to ask the Florida Department of Probation and Parole for any background report on the death row inmate, called a pre-sentence investigation (PSI) report, that the trial judge had.

"What we asked for was the PSI, and we ended up getting a post-sentence report and the psychologicals," Overton said. "It's not unusual that it (a psychological report) would be attached to the post-sentence report. That is not what we intended to have or what we should have had."

But the psychological reports were not attached simply as a matter of routine. Court Clerk White's office sent a separate letter asking for them.

One letter ordered the PSI, and copies of the letter were sent to prosecutors and defense attorneys.

The second letter went to the Department of Offender Rehabilitation, which has since been renamed the Department of Corrections. "This is to request a copy of the latest psychiatric evaluation made on the above-named inmate who is on death row." In only one case is there a notation that copies ... the letter were sent to lawyers involved in the case, and that defense attorney says he never got the court's letter or a copy of the psychological report.

Overton said he did not direct White to send separate letters. "They were to get the necessary information, that's all," Overton said.

After he decided the court shouldn't have gotten the psychological reports, Overton said, he directed Sid White to "review everything in the files and make sure we didn't have anything that was done subsequent to sentencing."

WHITE, WHO IS IN charge of all court records, said Overton told him to remove all the reports from the files. The reports were destroyed, White said.

Overton could not explain why, if the requests were routine following the Gardner decision, psychological reports were requested on some death row defendants and not others. And the court requested at least five of the profiles before, rather than after, the U.S. Supreme Court's ruling in Gardner.

White says the assistant clerk who wrote the letters misunderstood his instructions and mistakenly wrote the letters requesting the psychological reports.

Overton later called The Times to say he had found the form letter from which the assistant typed the requests. It indicates that copies should be sent to all attorneys, Overton said. It was a clerk's error, he said, that no copies of the Supreme Court requests were actually sent to the lawyers.

"I'm not saying that people don't goof," Overton said. "Even newspapers make mistakes."

He added, "There was no intent to hide anything or no intent to get any information the lawyers didn't have."

In one of the cases the court was considering, there was a mention of a psychological evaluation done in concert with the pre-sentence investigation, Overton said. The court wanted to see that, and White's office interpreted that as an order to get psychological reports in all cases, he said.

Vernon Bradford, a spokesman for the Department of Corrections, confirmed that the Supreme Court requested the reports. There is no record, he said, of exactly how many were requested or when the practice stopped.

THE PRISON SYSTEM employs a full-time psychiatrist, a full-time clinical psychologist and two psychologists with master's degrees.

All prisoners, including death row inmates are tested when they enter the prison system and "from time to time" as part of a review of their progress, Bradford said. The prisoners are interviewed and given standardized tests. Their lawyers are not routinely notified.

These are the reports that were sent to the court, Bradford said.

"Now you have to consider, what are the legal consequences of that mistake?" said Rogo of Nova University. "Was there any harm caused? Each attorney will have to review his or her case, look at the whole record and measure this against it."

Justices Admit Access To Death-Row Inmate Reports

TALLAHASSEE (UPI) — Supreme Court justices admitted Tuesday they had access to psychological reports on 20 death-row inmates that they should not have seen while reviewing the appropriateness of the penalty in the cases — but denied it influenced their decisions on whether the men should live or die.

"I am satisfied to a moral certainty that the reports did not influence the outcome of any case," Chief Justice Alan Sundberg said in an interview.

"To the extent that anyone can demonstrate prejudice," he said, "the court will entertain appeals and we'll have to take it on a case-by-case basis."

Tallahassee attorney Ted Mack has raised the issue on behalf of convicted killer Charles Dwight Messer. He asked for a hearing to determine if the court received a psychological report on Messer and whether the justices read it.

"I think there's a serious legal and ethical question that the Supreme Court is going to have to answer to," he said.

If the court should find error, it would not affect the conviction, but only the sentence.

The St. Petersburg Times revealed in a copyrighted story Tuesday that the court, without the knowledge of defense attorneys, obtained psychological profiles of at least 20 men waiting on death row for the court to review their sentences. The reports were made by the Department of Correction's parole and probation section between 1976 and mid-1978.

The U.S. Supreme Court has ruled that the courts cannot use any information in sentencing a convicted murderer that is not also available to defense attorneys.

Justice Ben Overton was chief justice at the time the post-sentencing psychological reports were received. He said they were obtained by mistake by the clerk's office. When the error was discovered, he said, the reports were removed from the files and returned to the department.

Overton said the court wanted to be sure it had all the information available to the trial judge in sentencing a convicted killer to death rather than life in prison.

In one case, he said, reference was made to a psychological report that was not in the file.

"One judge (nobody now can remember which one) noticed it and asked the clerk to get the report," Overton said. One of the deputies interpreted the instruction to mean that psychological reports were to be required in all cases, rather than just the one.

Overton can recall reading only the report on the case which prompted the complaint. Sundberg can't recall any of them, but said if they were a part of the record, he must have read one or more of them.

"But I am confident it did not affect the outcome of a single case," he said.

Justice Arthur England recalled seeing the reports, but said he didn't read them, adding, "It would be pretty outrageous if we considered something like that because it's not part of the record. And we haven't." Justice James Adkins Jr. said he might have seen one or more but never read them. Justice Joe Boyd said he didn't know attorneys were unaware that their clients were being psychologically evaluated and wants to know why they weren't told.

Two other justices on the court at the time — Fred Karl and Joseph Hatchett — are no longer members. Karl is in private practice and Hatchett is a federal appeals judge.

One of the cases in which a report was requested was that of Douglas Ray Meeks for whom the governor signed a death warrant last January. Meeks won a stay of execution.

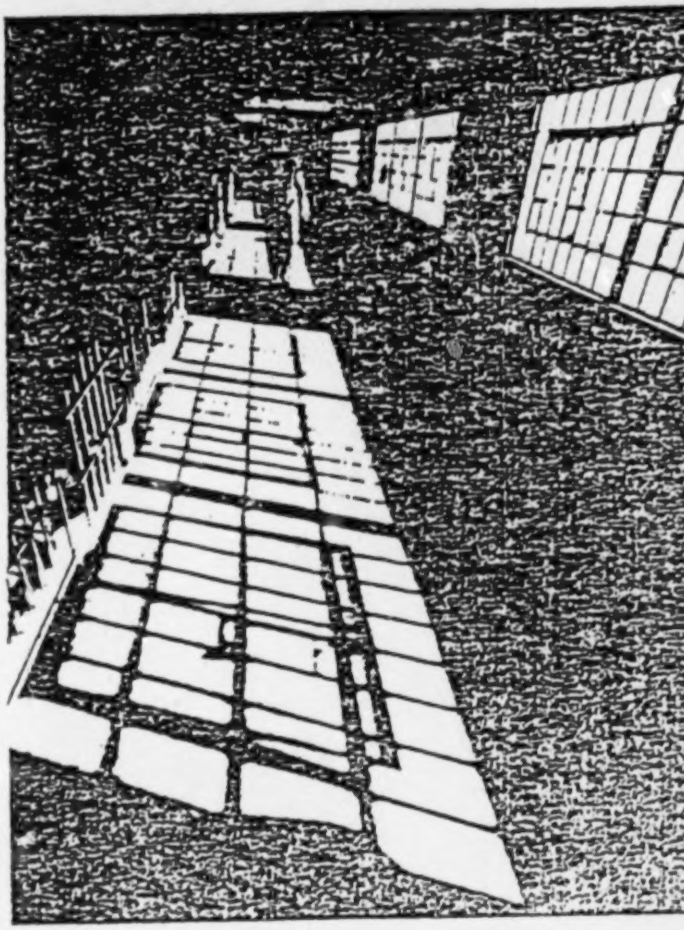
None of the 20 has been executed and most are still on death row. The court granted new sentencings or actually reduced the sentences to life for a few.

Among the cases are Carl Ray Songer, sentenced for killing a highway patrolman in Citrus County in 1972; Arthur Goode III, convicted of killing a young Cape Coral boy in 1978; Anthony Antone, sentenced in the 1978 murder of Tampa policeman Richard Cloud; and Daniel Thomas, leader of a skyjack gang that terrorized central Florida with a series of killings in 1968.

Challenge to death penalty

Papers barred, yet high court looked at them

BARBARA MALONE and KEN WALTON
Miami News Reporters



Defense attorneys across the state are preparing to attack the death sentences of all 131 people on Florida's death row, contending that the Florida Supreme Court looked at psychological reports on some of the condemned in violation of a U.S. Supreme Court ruling.

The defense lawyers say that the Florida justices violated the Supreme Court decision by looking at reports by prison psychologists without disclosing the evaluations to lawyers for the condemned.

That is grounds for overturning the sentences, said the lawyers, most of whom decline to be identified while the statewide challenge is being prepared.

"The U.S. Supreme Court has held that it is just not fair in a death case for a judge to base a death sentence on secret information — that a defense attorney has a right to know what the information is in order to argue against it," said Deborah Fins, an attorney with the NAACP Legal Defense Fund who is helping to coordinate the Florida appeal.

"If judges are making a decision about whether or not you live or die, you want to make sure that the information they are considering is accurate," Fins said.

The reports are based on mental examinations given by staff psychologists when inmates are first admitted to prison. Defense attorneys say death row inmates had no warning that what they told prison psychologists might later be used by a court in deciding whether they should live or die.

The justices acknowledge the court should not have had the reports, but say they never based a life-or-death ruling on one of them.

The defense lawyers claim the court wrongly:

✓ Decided on its own to obtain the reports, which weren't in trial court files.

✓ Didn't obtain them in all cases, and didn't explain what criteria it used in deciding when to obtain them.

✓ Didn't tell the lawyers on either side when it was obtaining them.

The defense lawyers say they don't know on how many occasions, or for how long, the court obtained the psychological reports in death cases.

Justice Ben Overton said the reports found their way into the Supreme Court files "inadvertently" because of an error by a deputy clerk. He said he asked the clerk to get a copy of a pre-sentence psychological report that had been considered by the trial judge but was not in the court file.

According to Overton, the deputy clerk misinterpreted his request, and began routinely ordering post-sentencing psychological reports made by staff psychologists at the Department of Corrections. Overton was chief justice at the time. Overton said he cannot remember the name of the deputy clerk.

Miami lawyer Robert Shevin, who as attorney general successfully argued the constitutionality of Florida's death penalty before the U.S. Supreme Court in 1976, said the attack is just a tactic to stall executions.

"Whenever you're dealing with the death penalty, those condemned to die are going to look for anything they can to delay the process," said Shevin.

He predicted that the legal attack might result in delaying executions "six months or a year," but that it would not result in any reversals of the death penalty.

Defense attorneys say they expect five members of the court to become witnesses. They are Chief Justice Alan Sundberg, and Justices Overton, James Adkins, Joseph Boyd and Arthur England. The other two justices, Parker McDonald and James Alderman, were not on the court when it obtained the reports.

Two former justices who sat on the court when it had the reports also are expected to be called as witnesses. They are Joseph Hatchett, now a judge on the U.S. Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals, and Fred Karl, who is in private law practice.

The St. Petersburg Times reported last month that the court in 1976-78 had looked at reports on some condemned men without disclosing them to defense attorneys.

"In some cases, we ended up with information we were not supposed to see," Justice Overton told the Times.

Justice Adkins told The Miami News he was opposed to the practice. "I didn't like what was going on," he said. "It looked to me like it was overreaching."

While several justices acknowledged that they read the reports while considering death sentences, they said they didn't rely on the reports in making decisions on executions.

Defense attorneys say the legal attack will be filed in both state and federal court. The challenge will contend that the court deprived death row inmates of due process of law because their lawyers couldn't explain or refute information in the reports.

The first defense attorney to learn of the practice was Assistant Public Defender Margaret Good of Tallahassee, who in mid-1978 was arguing against the death penalty on behalf of Paul McGill, an 18-year-old sentenced to die for robbing, raping and murdering a convenience-store clerk near Ocala.

Overton questioned Good about McGill's mental condition, referring to "a psychological screening report which says in part that he feels very limited control in stressful situations . . ."

Good told the court she did not have a copy of the report. She later filed a motion and obtained one.

The court later reduced McGill's sentence to life. It did not comment in its opinion on whether the psychological report had played a part in the decision.

The incident occurred more than a year after the U.S. Supreme Court held in March 1977, in Gardner v. Florida, that defense attorneys in death penalty cases are entitled to any confidential information relied on by the trial judge.

Daniel Gardner had been sentenced to death for stabbing his wife to death in Citrus County. The U.S. Supreme Court upheld his conviction, but overturned the death sentence because the trial judge considered "confidential" material not disclosed to the defendant's attorneys.

Since that time, defense attorneys from around the state have been pooling information about death cases and have concluded that the psychological reports were considered by the Florida Supreme Court in at least 20, and possibly more, death cases.

Martha Hall, a former law clerk for Justice England when he was chief justice, told The Miami News that she was told to go through about all death row files in August or September of 1978 — shortly after Good had learned of the reports — and to pull out all psychological reports.

Hall, who is now general counsel for the Department of Environmental Regulation, said she found reports in about 10 files and removed them. She said that after collecting the reports in a manila folder, she gave the folder to someone. She said she had them shredded.

Hall said she did not make a list of the defendants whose reports she removed, and that she cannot remember the names.

Hall said England's chief law clerk, Mike Rosen, told her to get rid of the reports. Rosen, who is now with a Tallahassee law firm, said he does not recall saying that.

England said he did not recall seeing any psychological evaluations, or ordering their removal from the file.

"I don't recall having seen a psychological evaluation, but that doesn't mean I haven't read one. I just don't remember," England said.

"I don't remember having a clerk remove the reports from the files, either. But if Marty (Martha Hall) says I told her to do it, I must have told her," England said.

Overton said he considers psychological reports important because a death sentence may be mitigated if the defendant was suffering from extreme mental disturbance or could not control his conduct. But when he discovered psychological reports that had not been provided to defense counsel were in the files, he said, he tried to rectify the situation.

"After I found out what happened I ordered the psychological evaluations pulled from the files because they did not belong there," Overton said.

During the period when the psychological reports were being sent to the Supreme Court, the court upheld the death sentence of John Spenkelink, who was executed in May, 1979. Spenkelink was the first — and so far the only — inmate to be executed in Florida since 1964.

Records in the Supreme Court clerk's office contain no indication that a psychological report on Spenkelink was ordered before his death sentence was upheld, according to deputy clerk Debbie Causseaux.

Hatchett said he expects the psychological reports to result in suits and he will have to excuse himself

Please see DEATH, 8A

DEATH, from 6A

from sitting on the appeals court judge bench. "I'm here to be a witness."

Adkins acknowledged having some of the reports, but said he "didn't pay any attention" to them. "The only thing I ever considered was the factual situation and the record that the trial judge had in front of him," Adkins said.

While Adkins said he disapproved of the court's obtaining the psychological reports, he said the fact that it did should not "befoul everything into a monumental issue that is going to turn the world upside down."

Sundberg said he remembers seeing some psychological evaluations in the files, and that he read them. "We are obliged to read a death case file from stem to stern," he said.

"I am convinced to a moral certainty that a psychological report did not affect my determination of a case because of the decision-making process I go through," Sundberg said.

Karl, who resigned from the court in April, 1978, said he could not remember whether he had seen any of the psychological reports. But, he said, "I do know that I never voted on a death case unless I could honestly say I had read every word that was available in the file."

Boyd said he "never saw any psychological reports and never read any."

"Somebody was smart enough, if those psychological reports were in there, to pull them out before they ever got to me," Boyd said.

Sid White, clerk of the Supreme Court, said he has ob ftd of the defendants whose psychological reports were ordered, then later pulled from the files.

"You would have to go through each one of the files to look for a copy of the letter requesting the psychological report, and we have not done that," White said.

Chief Deputy Clerk Brenda Smilgis said letters requesting the reports were written by several different clerks and signed by White. Smilgis said she could not recall the name of the original clerk who got Overton's request for report.

"We thought ordering the reports was a policy set up by the judges. We wouldn't do it on our own. We thought it was what the judges wanted," Smilgis said.

"When Justice Overton told us to stop, we stopped," she added.

Defense attorneys say searching for letters requesting the reports, as White suggested, would not show all cases in which the reports were obtained. Records at the Department of Corrections, spot-checked by The Miami News, show that in some death row cases, psychological reports were sent to the court without a written request.

Defense attorneys say they can't uncover the full extent of the practice until they take sworn testimony from the justices, their former law clerks, and deputy clerks.

If the justices should become witnesses, the case could be heard by Florida's appeals court judges from around the state, or even circuit court judges.

Shevin, the former state attorney general, said he thought the attack would be relevant only in cases in which secret psychological reports had actually been read by the justices. "All of the rest of the attacks would be frivolous," he maintained.

"It's unfortunate there are these delays because if the death penalty is going to serve as a deterrent, it must be carried out," Shevin said, pointing out that although Gov. Graham has signed 18 death warrants, all but Spenkelink's have been stayed by appeals.

Graham signed two death warrants last week, ordering the executions of 25-year-old Leonne Hargrave of Milton and 30-year-old Carl Ray Songer of Citrus County. Hargrave was convicted of killing a Dade convenience store clerk during an aborted robbery in 1976; Songer was convicted of murdering a Florida Highway Patrol trooper in Citrus County in 1973.

Songer's court file shows that he is one of the condemned men whose secret psychological report was ordered from the Department of Corrections. But the file doesn't show whether the report was ever received.

Hargrave's court file contains no indication his psychological report was requested or received.

SUPREME COURT OF FLORIDA

JOSEPH GREEN BROWN, et al.,

Petitioners,

- v. -

LOUIE L. WAINWRIGHT, Secretary, Department of Corrections, State of Florida, Respondent.

CASE NO.

MOTION FOR REFERENCE OF JOINT PETITION TO SPECIAL MASTER AND FOR OTHER APPROPRIATE REMEDIES IN THE EVENT OF FACTUAL DISPUTE

If the factual allegations of the petition filed contemporaneously with this motion are not admitted, petitioners respectfully move that this Court forthwith enter orders immediately necessary to preserve relevant evidence, and then refer their joint petition to a Special Master for hearing, as described more fully below.

The documents which petitioners present in Appendix B to the petition suggest that there have been serious constitutional violations in this Court's adjudication of capital appeals under Florida's "trifurcated" sentencing system. The complete facts are not known at this time, and petitioners lack both the forum and the compulsory process necessary to develop them. Only this Court can establish the comprehensive and systematic procedures to identify and rectify whatever errors occurred, however inadvertently, in connection with this information.

It is clear that this Court is not the place to resolve disputed factual issues. In Gardner v. Florida, 430 U.S. 349 (1977), the State attached to its brief what was purported to be the "confidential" portion of petitioner Gardner's presentence investigation report that had not been disclosed to defense counsel. The Supreme Court of the United States refused to consider or evaluate this document:

> It is not a function of this Court to evaluate in the first instance the possibly prejudicial impact of acts and opinions appearing in a presentence report. We therefore do not consider the contents of the appendix to the State's brief.

Id. at 354-355 n.5. Moreover, the Court made clear in its disposition of Gardner that an evidentiary hearing was necessary before the death sentence could be imposed on petitioner Gardner because many disputed issues had to be resolved by a factfinder concerning the statements in the presentence report. The State had contended that if reversible error had been committed by the non-disclosure of the presentence report, the Supreme Court should remand the case to this Court, and let this Court place the report in the record and then review petitioner Gardner's death sentence on the amended record. The Supreme Court of the United States rejected such a disposition.

In light of the common disclosures and evidence which may be required in an extremely large number of cases -- from the Justices of this Court, court personnel, Department of Corrections employees, Florida Parole and Probation Commission employees and other individuals -- judicial economy and efficiency dictate the appointment of a neutral and detached Special Master to preside over a unitary, adversary fact-finding proceeding. The Special Master should be given an explicit mandate to investigate fully the questions presented in the petition, including, but not limited to, the power to authorize discovery by the parties, e.g. depositions and interrogatories, and the power to inspect, in the presence of counsel, all records maintained by this Court, the trial courts, Department of Corrections, Florida State Prison, the Florida Parole and Probation Commission, and any other appropriate state agency or office.

It would also then appear, as we must regretfully note, that if this Court refers the joint petition to a Special Master with the capacity to receive testimony, then by the allegations and the nature of this cause the Justices of this Court, because of their direct and unique knowledge of the practices involved, including the alleged destruction of documentary evidence, would be material witnesses with an interest in the outcome of the proceeding, and disqualification would be proper. Under the circumstances present in this cause, disqualification would be appropriate in order for this Court to assure petitioners that they will receive a fair hearing in a fair tribunal -- a basic requirement of due process. In re Murchison, 349 U.S. 133, 136 (1955). Disqualification is needed to avoid even the appearance of impropriety. Fla. Bar Code Jud. Conduct, Canons 2, 3C(1). See Fla. Bar Code Jud. Conduct, Canons 3A(4), 3B(1), 3B(2).

PRAYER FOR RELIEF

Based upon the foregoing, in the event of factual dispute, petitioners respectfully request:

1. that this Court enter its order directing the preservation and maintenance of all files, docket sheets, documents, recordings and other information and material received by, in the possession of, or under the control of this Court pertaining to every capital case filed in this Court since December 1, 1972;

2. that this Court enter its order directing the Division of Archives, History and Records Management, the Department of Corrections, the Florida Parole and Probation Commission, the judges and clerks of the several judicial circuits of the State of Florida, and any and all other state agencies having access to such files, docket sheets, documents, recordings and other information and material, and the agents and employees thereof, to preserve and maintain intact all files, docket sheets, documents, recordings and other information and material received, in possession of, or under the control of said court or agency pertaining to every capital case filed since December 1, 1972;

3. that this Court enter its order appointing a Special Master to conduct evidentiary proceedings under the conditions described above;

4. that after completion of proceedings by the Special Master, there be a full opportunity for briefing and oral argument on the issues presented herein;

5. that this Court grant its order authorizing the payment of all costs attendant to this proceeding;

6. that this Court grant such further appropriate relief as required by the nature of the proceedings.

MOTION TO DISMISS

COME NOW Respondents pursuant to Fla.R.App.P. 9.300 and move to dismiss the Petition filed in the above-styled cause for the following reasons.

I.

The Petition fails to state a legal basis upon which relief can or should be granted.

II.

Either in pursuance of Chapter 79, Fla.Stat., the rules of this Court appertaining thereunto or any cases dealing with petitions for writ of habeas corpus and the requisites therefore, the Petition herein is woefully lacking either in factual allegations or any other particulars deemed necessary as a matter of law.

Petitioners present five grounds upon which they argue collectively they are entitled to relief. Specifically, Petitioners argue that they were denied due process rights to fair capital review procedures in that this Court requested and received information de hors the record in violation of Gardner v. Florida, 430 U.S. 349, (1977); denied the right to effective assistance of counsel; denied the right to confrontation; denied their Eighth Amendment right to proportionality in capital sentencing in violation of Proffitt v. Florida, 428 U.S. 242 (1976) and denied their right against self-incrimination and the right of the assistance of counsel in deciding whether to exercise their right contrary to Smith v. Estelle, 602 F.2d 694 (5th Cir. 1979) cert. granted 100 S.Ct. 1311 (1980).

Respondents would submit that as to Petitioners' claims that they were denied due process; denied effective of counsel, denied the right to confrontation; denied the Eighth Amendment right to reliability in capital sentencing and denied the rights against self-incrimination and the right of assistance of counsel in deciding whether to exercise that right; Petitioners have failed to individually allege facts which, if true, would entitle them to relief. Each of the above noted rights allegedly denied the Petitioners sub judice, are individual rights which must be exercised by the offended party rather than vicariously through the rights of a third party. In Rakas v. Illinois, 439 U.S. 128 at 139 (1978), the United States Supreme Court expounded upon the particular rights of the Fourth and Fifth Amendments.

> It should be emphasized that nothing we say here casts the least doubt upon cases which recognize that, as a general proposition, the issue of standing involves two inquiries; First, whether the proponent of a particular legal right has alleged "injury in fact," second, whether the proponent is asserting his own legal rights and interest rather than basing his claim for relief upon the rights of third parties.

The Court in Footnote 8 further observed:

> This approach is consonant with that which the court already has taken with respect to the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination, which also is a purely personal right.

[Id. at 140]

See, also, United States v. White, 322 U.S. 694 (1944); Data Processing Service v. Camp, 397 U.S. 150 (1970). Fisher v. United States, 426 U.S. 319 (1976) and Rawlings v. Kentucky, ___ U.S. ___, 65 L.Ed.2d 633 (1980).

Respondents would submit that as to Petitioners' complaints that their rights have been violated, violations which might have occurred against a few cannot be said to have permeated every Petitioner's case where no factual allegations individually have been made to demonstrate same. Where the particular right is an individual right which must be exercised, Rakas v. Illinois, supra, particular and individual allegations of facts must be set forth before entitlement to a hearing or other relief under habeas corpus proceedings may be granted. In short, there are no allegations of fact by any particular petitioner to show his constitutional rights were violated, which is essential to habeas corpus relief.

The burden is the individual Petitioner's to come forth with sufficient allegations which would entitle him, based on his particular circumstances, to relief. State ex rel Recio v. Simpson, 10 So.2d 909 (Fla. 1942); Ex Parte Stoddard, 34 So.2d 92 (Fla. 1948). Therefore, without factual circumstances being alleged on an individual level, this Court has nothing before it to enable it to pass upon the Fifth, Sixth, Eighth, and Fourteenth Amendment claims raised in unison by Petitioners.

The sole legal issue before this Court and the actual gravamen of the Petition is the question found in subsection (e) of the Petition, to-wit: whether the Eighth Amendment right to proportionality in capital sentencing has been violated. Petitioners assert that:

> The constitutionality of Florida's capital punishment statute was upheld in 1976, on the explicit assumption that review in this Court would be satisfactory to guard against capricious and disportionate infliction of the death penalty.
> [Petitioner's Petition - 9]

Petitioners now assert that:

> The receipt of this Court of different information in different cases--information which was not before the trial jury or judge--has eviscerated the system of checks and balances the trifurcated Florida death penalty structure was designed to guarantee.

[Petitioner's Petition - 11]

In essence, Petitioners argue that because of alleged violation in a few cases, which are unspecified and unidentified herein, the entire system has been infected and proportionality in sentencing is no longer plausible in the capital sentencing structure.

> The court's practice thus has prejudiced all capital appellants, both those for whom information may have been received and those whom it has not.

[Petitioner's Petition - 11]

Petitioners liken the alleged receipt by this Court of information not available to the trial judge and jury a violation of Gardner v. Florida, supra. In essence, Petitioners are expanding the concept of Gardner to appeallte review. Respondents would submit that assuming for the moment that the Florida Supreme Court has received information not made available to the trial court and jury, Petitioners or the State, and assuming Gardner v. State, supra, applies to appellate review of proceedings, a violation in a few cases does not mean the entire trifurcated capital punishment structure collapses and all death sentences are invalid. In the very decision that the Petitioners are relying on, to-wit: Gardner v. Florida, supra, the United States Supreme Court did not throw out the capital sentencing statutes, but rather vacated and remanded the case for further disposition by the Florida Supreme Court. Specifically, the Court noted:

> There remains only the question of what disposition is now proper. Petitioner's conviction of course is not tainted by the error in the sentencing procedure. The State argues that we should merely remand the case to the Florida Supreme Court with directions > to have the entire Pre-Sentence Report made part of the record to enable that Court to complete its reviewing functions. That procedure, however, could not fully correct that full disclosure, followed by explanation or argument by defense counsel, would have caused the trial judge to accept the jury's advisory verdict. Accordingly, the death sentence is vacated and the case is remanded to the Florida Supreme Court with directions to order further proceedings at the trial court level not inconsistent with this opinion.

Indeed, this very Court, following the decision in Gardner v. Florida, supra, attempted to correct any Gardner violations in post-Gardner cases by ordering the trial courts of this state in capital cases to respond as to whether Pre-Sentence Investigations were utilized and not made available to given defendants. Many of the Petitioners in this Petition received the benefit of this Court's actions. Similarly, a like result could and should obtain in the case at bar where those Petitioners aggrieved by the alleged activities of this Court can demonstrate that in their particular and individual case, the appellate application of Gardner v. Florida, supra, is a viable complaint.

Thus, the gravamen of the Petitioners' complaint herein and the sole legal issue before this Court must be dismissed for failing to state a valid complaint entitling all the Petitioners to relief.

In Godfrey v. Georgia, 64 L.Ed.2d 398, the United States Supreme Court reversed Godfrey's death sentence and remanded the case for further disposition. The court held:

> Thus, the validity of Petitioner's death sentences turn on whether, in light of the facts and circumstances of the murders that Godfrey was convicted of committing, the Georgia Supreme Court can be said to have applied a constitutional construction of the phrase "outrageously or wantonly vile, horrible, or inhuman in that (they) involved . . . depravity of mind. . ." We conclude > that the answer must be no. The Petitioner's crimes cannot be said to have reflected a consciousness materially more depraved than any person guilty of murder.

> [Id. at 409]

The United States Supreme Court did not strike down the Georgia death penalty statute and all Georgia death sentences, but rather vacated the death sentence and remanded for further disposition. See, also, Presnell v. Georgia, 439 U.S. 14 (1978).

Assuming for the moment that a few of the Petitioners may have a legitimate claim against the reviewing practices of the Florida Supreme Court, this particular contention must fail as a matter of law because there has been no showing nor case authority provided which would support these Petitioners' contention that proportionality in imposing or affirming death sentences has been precluded. See, Spinkellink v. Wainwright, 578 F.2d 582 at 613 (5th Cir. 1978) and Meeks v. State, 382 So.2d 673 (Fla. 1980).

III.

Petitioners argue that they have filed jointly in an interest of judicial economy because of the common issues of law and fact presented citing to In re Baker, 267 So.2d 331 (Fla. 1972). In In re Baker, supra, this Court, following the decision in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972) recognized the need to collectively vacate the sentences of those persons on death row following the fall of the capital punishment structure at that time. That action was in direct response to the United States Supreme Court's striking down capital punishment throughout the country, not just in Florida. To require each of those individuals on death row in 1972 to individually litigate whether they should be on death row would have been ridiculous. Furman v. Georgia, supra, went to the heart of capital punishment and struck it down. In the case at bar, all of these Petitioners on death row in 1980, challenge the efficacy of proportionality review and complain about personal rights which cannot be exercised vicariously. In essence, the complaints herein are both factually and legally wanting, do not go to the very heart of the capital punishment structure, but merely attempt to collectively make their petition whole in spite of the fact that the sum of the parts does not reach that result. The only common thread running through this Petition is the fact that each Petitioner has challenged the status of proportionality in Florida's capital punishment statute. That issue, as a matter of law, must fail, and thus, the common cause which unites Petitioners in In re Baker, supra, does not exist here.

CONCLUSION

Respondents would respectfully urge this Court to grant their Motion to Dismiss the instant Petition in that Petitioners' complaints which allege personal violations of the Fifth, Sixth, Eighth, and Fourteenth Amendments to the United States Constitution are devoid of factual allegations sufficient to support the Petitioners' bald complaints that their rights have been violated. Rakas v. Illinois, supra. In regard to the only legal issue before this Court, to-wit: whether Florida still has proportionality review of the imposition of death sentences, Petitioners have failed to make out a claim as a matter of law which would entitle them to relief. Petitioners have failed to make a prima facie showing that their death sentences which were affirmed by this Court or are pending on review, have been tainted by an alleged appellate Gardner violation which may have occurred in a few unspecified and unidentified cases.

WHEREFORE, Respondents would respectfully urge this Court grant Respondents' Motion to Dismiss.

P R O C E E D I N G S

CHIEF JUSTICE SUNDBERG: Good morning, ladies and gentlemen. We will convene this morning. We're here on the case of Brown versus Wainwright.

Is Counsel for the Petitioners ready to proceed?

MR. FRANKEL: Ready, Your Honor.

CHIEF JUSTICE SUNDBERG: Please proceed, sir.

MR. FRANKEL: May it please the Court, this application for extraordinary relief and petition for writ of habeas corpus on behalf of 123 petitioners on death row raises fundamental problems that have emerged or appear to have emerged from this Court's efforts to administer its grave responsibility for reviewing every death sentence passed in the state of Florida. From the -- at this point -- undisputed allegations of our application, it appears that these problems arise from the Court's understandable effort to be fully informed about the relevant facts and possibly relevant opinions before it makes its final and independent decision as to who may live and who must die.

The difficulty that has been disclosed as a result of that effort to learn all the possible facts is that it appears to have come to pass that through requests emanating from this courthouse, and perhaps in other ways, there has come to be placed in the record of this Court in connection with appeals in capital cases important data, information, opinions placed in the Court without notice of those deliveries of information to the appellants or to their lawyers.

In this state of affairs, the Appellants and their lawyers have been deprived of the basic opportunity to consider the materials being used in their cases, to assist -- in the case of the lawyers -- to assist their clients and the Court in understanding, evaluating and weighing these materials.

The result of that course of events in our respective submission on this application has been an array of serious violations of the Constitution of this state and the Constitution of the United States. The kinds of materials to which we refer, and on which this petition is made, are outlined in the papers, but their nature and their extent are matters of importance. And I think it's appropriate to take a minute to enumerate the items which our incomplete understanding reveals to have been placed in this Court.

They include psychiatric evaluations of the capital Appellants. They include psychiatric contact notes, all made by people on this gravest of subjects with respect to capital defendants who are not present, of course, to be examined or cross-examined; and, more gravely still, all delivered into the courthouse without the knowledge of the Appellants or their lawyers and without any opportunity for them to see these materials and consider them with the Supreme Court.

The materials include similarly psychological screening reports of which the same observations could be made. They include presentence investigation reports, both on the capital crime and, in a number of instances, on crimes other than the one which is the subject of the appeal to this Court.

Even when they relate to the capital crime in question, these reports in a number of instances appear to have been delivered to this Court without the knowledge of Counsel that they were here, and in cases where they were no part of the stated record before the Court on the appeal.

They include in one or more instances reports to the Court of the capital Appellants' refusal to participate in the procedure for a psychiatric evaluation. They include parole reports, reports of violations and other investigations.

In one instance known, and perhaps in others, a Federal presentence report was sent to this Court in connection with one of these appeals. And without enumerating necessarily everything that's indicated in the Appendix to the petition, I mention also state prison classification and admissions summaries.

JUSTICE ENGLAND: Mr. Frankel, let me ask you to pause there because that, I think in part, goes to the heart of what you are about.

The last three things you mentioned: Recitations -- one of them was recitations of a Defendant's refusal to submit to a psychiatric evaluation. Do you mean the Robert Fieldmore Lewis case, Page 66 of your transcript?

MR. FRANKEL: Yes, Your Honor, I do.

JUSTICE ENGLAND: Is there any other besides that?

MR. FRANKEL: Well, there is no other that we know of at this time, Your Honor.

JUSTICE ENGLAND: Probation and parole violation reports; do you refer there to Valle, Page 109, and Drake, Page 111 of your Appendix, or are there others that I have overlooked?

MR. FRANKEL: Your Honor, I think those are all.

JUSTICE ENGLAND: With regard to prison classifications and admission summaries, I take it you mean Thomas, Page 82 of your Appendix; are there any others?

MR. FRANKEL: Your Honor, I am not certain, but I think there is a case of a Ferguson that's in that category. Let me say, generally, Your Honor, if I may, in answer to this question --

JUSTICE ENGLAND: I haven't asked the question.

MR. FRANKEL: -- that we have had the most limited kind of exploration to uncover the facts about these assertions. We think, as I will be urging on the Court, that enough has been shown to demonstrate a grave and probably fatal defect in the process.

But, if there were issues of fact about how many, and if that matters with respect to each category, as a supplemental motion we've made indicates we need to explore those situations, explore the files and other things to find out.

JUSTICE ENGLAND: Yes, I understand that to be the thrust of what you are saying. My point in raising this was -- and I don't know about Ferguson. I will have to check that. I have been through your Appendix and I thought that these were the ones that you were referring to in these categories.

The Lewis letter, on Page 76, volunteers wholly unsolicited from this Court that a denial of testing was made by Robert Fieldmore Lewis on the advice of counsel.

As I read the Thomas letter on Page 82, it doesn't say that a prison admission summary is being sent to the Court, but it says that was an excuse for their not sending another document that was requested from the Department of Corrections.

As I read Valle's document, there was a violation report prepared and sent to us in lieu of a presentence investigation because we had asked for that.

As I read Drake's, the only letter I see there says that he violated parole by committing the murder with which he was charged, and that was in evidence before the trial.

Now, my question on that is, if these are the only documents that support those three allegations, which are at the beginning of the opinion and which you characterize as very grave mistakes by this Court--which have been picked up and widely broadcast by the media, and have in fact affected the perspective of the process of this Court -- if these are the three things that you rely on for those allegations, do you think those were fair bases for those? Were they made in good faith?

MR. FRANKEL: Your Honor, we think the allegations of this petition are fair and that an appreciation of their scope, their gravity and their fairness requires addressing all of them. The ones Your Honor mentioned with deference are toward the end of my list. The list began with materials that I believe are much more dramatic and much more troublesome. Psychiatric--

JUSTICE ENGLAND: That may be. It's on Page 2 of your petition, and it's a list --

MR. FRANKEL: Pardon?

JUSTICE ENGLAND: It's on Page 2 of your petition, and it is a list that has no separation, six items put together. Are you now telling me that three are inconsequential?

MR. FRANKEL: No, Your Honor, I am not telling you that. I am saying that as in many other instances in the law, it is the accumulation of circumstances that must be considered in appraising the weight and the gravity of what's being claimed. And I am saying--and this is one of the purposes, I take it, of conversations with the Court in the nature of oral argument--that if we must analyze these materials, I would say that their relative significance and their relative gravity, though I withdraw none of them, varies from item to item. And what we have alleged, for example, is a substantial number already discovered without knowledge of what else might be discovered if issues of fact really arise about this, a substantial number of psychiatric evaluation reports.

What we have shown in this Appendix with respect to the unfortunate and undoubtedly well intended ex parte character of these submissions includes, for example, in several cases situations like this where, on the same day, there issues out of this Court a request for a copy of the presentence report and a copy of that request goes to defense counsel.

On that same day, there issues out of this Court with respect to the same Appellant, a request for a psychiatric evaluation and no copy to defense counsel of that request.

Now, I started out by saying because on behalf of all these lawyers, I mean to say that our best understanding of how this situation arose is that it stems from what we -- without wishing to be presumptuous -- view as a probably commendable desire in a court saddled with the grim responsibility to leave no stone unturned in acquiring accurate information about the solemn problem of deciding who should be executed and who should be sent to prison for life.

So, as to the problems of motivation, we think they're not important. We think if they were, we would have every reason to feel that the motivations are humane and positive.

What we complain about is the result of these efforts as nearly as we can reconstruct their origin and their nature. And what we say is that whatever the reason and the cause and the occasion for these ex parte communications in pending cases, whatever the reason for that, it is a violation of the most fundamental notions of fairness in our system of adversary justice. It's a violation of the most elementary kinds of protections that a litigant in any case is entitled to expect from any court, from any judge, at any stage of any proceeding.

JUSTICE ENGLAND: Mr. Frankel, I know you are going to want to get into an argument on each of the legal bases that you assert. But, to help me again understand the thrust of where you are going and what conclusions you draw, the petition appears to cover a number of people whose sentences were imposed by a trial court but are now pending on review here. I'm not exactly certain what relief you request or what you seek as to those. There certainly is no action yet by this Court.

What is it precisely that you would have us do? Is it that you want a new court to replace this one in considering the appeals of those Defendants because of the overall skewing that has taken place in our processes from 1965?

MR. FRANKEL: Your Honor, our broadest submission, as I will state it now and elaborate it at the Court's pleasure, is that the practice of which these Petitioners complain, however it evolved, discloses defects so pervasive and so fatal in the capital system, capital sentencing system of this state as to invalidate that system and to invalidate the statute under which these sentences are imposed. We urge and press that submission. Obviously, in the course of this argument, subject to the Court's interests and questions, other possibilities will be explored.

But, the answer to Your Honor's question is that if we are right, as we believe, if the system of appeals has been seriously infected and invalidated, then it serves the interests of this Court, as well as the Appellants whose cases are pending here, to press that point in their cases as well as those of others whose appeals have already been decided.

How broadly this cuts and what its consequences may be, are, of course, matters submitted for the Court's judgment. But, it seemed to us in formulating this position, that its breadth and its basic character required us to lay it before the Court with respect to all the cases potentially affected. And that includes, in our judgment, those that are here or in some way pending in this Court.

JUSTICE ENGLAND: I'm not sure I still follow you. You want to lay before us the argument in those pending cases. Do you want us to vacate death sentences imposed by the trial court for an error which has not yet occurred here in those cases?

MR. FRANKEL: Your Honor, we do, if we're right-- if we're right that the course in which the Court finds itself to which it has been driven in administering this statute, if we're right in saying that that course lays bare the invalidity of that statute, then we would claim nobody can be sentenced to death under it.

JUSTICE ENGLAND: So, it is not this Court which is tainted, because you are not asking for a substitute court who has never been through a process of reviewing something they shouldn't have; you are not asking to replace us as individuals with another Supreme Court. You are saying that no Supreme Court can now properly approve a death sentence because of what we did; is that right?

MR. FRANKEL: We are saying that, Your Honor; we are saying a number of other things depending on --

JUSTICE ENGLAND: No, what I mean --

MR. FRANKEL: -- how this Court -- yes, sir. In order to give you a complete answer, among the things we say are if the State and the Court should find that any of the factual presentations we make require evidentiary exploration, we're saying that this Court with all respect should recuse itself because the actions or non-actions of the Justices of the Court are drawn into question and Justices of the Court might well, however delicately that would have to be handled, might well be called to testify as to how these matters were conducted. In that situation, we would say the Court would be disqualified to sit.

If the statute is as we submit invalid and unconstitutional because of the necessities it has permitted or led to, then, of course, all levels of proceedings under the statute are invalidated and no death sentence can stand.

JUSTICE ENGLAND: You have to help me because there is a leap in there I still don't understand. If we have erred in our process and if, hypothetically, all existing affirmed death sentences are invalid because we skewed the process in some cases, the proportionality requirement requires that all that we have considered must be thrown out, why does that prevent a new court of another seven people from starting over and applying the statute which the United States Supreme Court has said is valid?

MR. FRANKEL: Your Honor, the United States Supreme Court said that the statute Your Honors have tried so hard to administer was valid in part as a result of certain repairs and improvements that this Court had made, as is its right, in construing that statute. A Supreme Court that was not undivided accepted those administrative additions, judicial administrative additions as answering any objections based on the difference between Florida statute, say, and that of Georgia.

There was a certain assumption of judicial facts underlying the Proffitt decision that led to the sustaining of the statute.

In the fullness of time, if we're right in our fact and in our law, it has come to be seen that the statute doesn't work right, that apart from the relatively, relatively minor omissions from the statute that worry the Supreme Court but that it finally found supplied by this Court -- Dixon and other decisions -- we now discover that this Court behaving responsibly appears to have found it necessary over and over again to fill gaps in this statute by dealing in ex parte information.

We presume that the Court and we believe that the Court, apart from lawyers' presumptions, has undertaken to do its job the best way it could to make the statute work the best way it could. And our position is that the statute doesn't work. A statute that permits or requires this profound violation of the most basic rights of litigants, rights that litigants have in promissory note cases, can't be an adequate statute for determining who should be sentenced to die at the hands of the State.

CHIEF JUSTICE SUNDBERG: Mr. Frankel, you're suggesting -- the bottom premise here is that this is in the nature of a Gardner violation.

MR. FRANKEL: It is one of our bottom premises, yes, Your Honor.

CHIEF JUSTICE SUNDBERG: Well, why did the same conclusion not flow from the fact that there were Gardner violations at the trial court where there has been resentencing by the same trial judge?

MR. FRANKEL: Your Honor, the violation here is a Gardner type of violation, but its implications and its ramifications, because we're dealing, however regrettably, with the Supreme Court of the State of Florida are much broader, much deeper than the problems of trial judges exploiting Gardner. Let me --

CHIEF JUSTICE SUNDBERG: Pardon me just a moment so you can explore this with me. Why is the implication greater in this Court's review of a sentence than the implication where a trial judge is in fact imposing a sentence? Two different functions.

MR. FRANKEL: Let me try to answer that, Your Honor. The role of this Court, as I need not remind Your Honor, in the determination that Florida had a valid capital sentencing statute, the role of this Court was central and critical. And its role was to see to it that the rules and the standards for imposing death sentences were fair, reliable, consistent, proportional -- all those things.

This Court supplies the guidelines and supplies the regulatory machinery for making sure that capital punishment is not imposed arbitrarily and capriciously.

CHIEF JUSTICE SUNDBERG: Generally, as a matter of law.

MR. FRANKEL: Generally, as a matter of law. And what the law is, is inseparably related in this field, as in so many others, Your Honor, with what factual things are material. After all, the way the law evolved was by judges, in case after case, deciding what facts made a difference about what. And from that, in our peculiar system, we inferred rules of law, at least when we were mostly a common law society.

Now, what this Court, in our view, has demonstrated is that in order to make the system work fairly, it was required to deal in a way that in retrospect and in the large turns out to be haphazard and, to put a point on it, arbitrary in its function. That is to say, take any given case where a record has been made in the trial court -- Gardner teaches us that the record on appeal should not be different from the record on which the trial judge decided. It should not be less. We say a fortiori, it should not be more; and that for very critical reasons. When this Court--

JUSTICE ADKINS: Pardon me while I interrupt you there. Your statement that it should not be more. That, of course, is fundamental principles of law. In this part of your argument, if you will, please consider the case of Alvord; are you familiar with that, where we were confronted with the situation where the trial judge in imposing sentence was aware of certain matters. And we pointed out the distinction in that case between being aware of something and considering something.

And we said in the opinion that a trial judge, in performance of his judicial duties, could well be aware of something, but it does not necessarily invalidate the sentence because it appears that he didn't consider it. Now, that was at the trial level. That case went to the United States Supreme Court. And it was a dissenting opinion which set out the other view, but the majority of the United States Supreme Court denied cert.

Now, my query is: On the motion to dismiss, we, of course, accept everything you said in your petition as being true. And even accepting that and assuming that there was something in the record at our level that was not in the record at the trial level, why shouldn't that same principle be applicable to us on review as it was in the Alvord case where the trial judge was involved?

MR. FRANKEL: Your Honor, first -- and one is driven to repeat that all these things are said with special deference -- first, the question of what happened with these ex parte materials in this courthouse is at some stage question of fact. We have been assured -- I, coming in from the outside, reading the materials and learning from the lawyers involved, the Bar has been assured, death sentence appellants have been assured that the Justices of this Court read all of the files in death cases. Where ex parte materials have found their way into those files, we are expected and entitled to presume that those portions of the files have been read. It is a deep question of fact whether any judge reading a psychiatric evaluation in a death case would merely be aware of it and not consider it.

And it's important, Your Honor, to have in mind at this point that because of the unequal situation we have here, where it appears that in some cases psychiatric evaluations are obtained and read and in some cases not, this problem may cut more deeply as a result of the cases where Your Honors may have read psychiatric evaluations and set aside death sentences than it does in cases where ex parte materials have been read in connection with affirmances of death sentences.

And let me say why: If -- if by its conduct the Court has shown or maybe inferred to have shown that a psychiatric evaluation made after a man goes to prison is a material item of information in connection with the death sentence that may lead to a reversal and a life sentence, then, depending on what we finally learn are the facts and what the Court finally tells us are the facts.

JUSTICE ADKINS: Let me ask you one other question. Assuming all of that to be true -- I understand that you are talking about the effect, that the inability of the Court to be aware of something without considering it. That's fundamentally what you are arguing.

MR. FRANKEL: I'm saying more than that, Your Honor. I am saying that you may all unintentionally have done worse injury to the people with respect to whom no ex parte evidence was considered than was done to those where it was considered or where the Court was aware of it because what the Bar was not aware of was that in effectively representing these Appellants, it was appropriate, desirable and useful to get these psychiatric evaluations before the Court because they might help.

JUSTICE OVERTON: Let me ask you this. What's different between those cases where there is a presentence investigation report and those cases where there has been no presentence investigation report, which this Court has approved as far as the matter that it's discretionary with the trial judge whether or not he orders a presentence investigation report? Now, there are cases that have it and there are cases that do not have it properly.

Now, as I understand your argument, is the fact that if one case has a presentence investigation report, then all cases must have a presentence investigation report; am I correct?

MR. FRANKEL: No, Your Honor, not necessarily. We are not saying that. We're saying that where this Court, the ultimate voice of the State on this question, says something is appropriate, necessary, desirable to consider in connection with a case and where this Court apparently has done that ex parte, so that nobody could know what was material, so that lawyers to that extent functioned in the dark in collecting the materials with which to represent their clients, we say that the whole process has been infected because of the failure to give the guidance and exercise the control and impose the consistency, the uniformity, the rationality, the proportionality that's the key function of the highest court of this state if its statute could be held valid. That's what we're saying at this point.

CHIEF JUSTICE SUNDBERG: Mr. Frankel, this is why -- if I may interrupt -- it gets down to what really baseline the function of this Court is. You used the phrase that we make the final independent decision as to who may live and who may die. Is that an accurate statement? That statement implies that we impose sentence. And that's why I asked you earlier isn't there a difference in function between the trial judge? Under our statute it's the function of the jury to make a recommendation, it's the function of the trial judge to impose sentence; it's the function of this Court to review sentence, not to impose it.

MR. FRANKEL: Your Honor, let me -- to coin a phrase -- assume arguendo that that's all this Court's function is. And in two minutes I am going to say I think the function is more than that based on what the Court has told the world. Let's suppose that the only function of this Court for the moment is reviewing death sentences. Now, what does it mean to be the court of last resort? It means to be the law-making and the law-giving tribunal for that purpose.

Now, how do lawyers and lower court judges know what the law is? Well, we all know about that. We read the appellate court decisions. We read the opinions and we were taught that it's not just the bland statement of legal conclusions but the facts that the court treats as material that we have to look at in order to know what the law is.

Now, what emerges in that respect alone from this Court's function, this Court may have evolved -- we can't be sure -- in a somewhat chancy and happenstantial way a rule that one of the material items to be considered in connection with a death case is a post-sentencing psychiatric evaluation.

CHIEF JUSTICE SUNDBERG: Fine. You're suggesting then that this Court simply does not articulate all the facts or all the reasoning upon which it makes rules of law?

MR. FRANKEL: Well, I am suggesting, Your Honor, with respect much more than that because the whole system, the whole system collapses all across the board if beyond failures of articulation, which happen to human beings, even judges, beyond that, the tribunal looks at undisclosed facts that affect its judgment and doesn't tell anybody about that.

Now, one of the basic canons of judicial conduct before you get to the Constitution is that in any kind of case no judge will initiate or receive ex parte communications.

JUSTICE ENGLAND: Well, Mr. Frankel, let me see where that takes you. I am told that the Tallahassee Democrat, a newspaper in this city, produced a series of articles summarizing a book about Theodore Bundy's trials. I, or my wife, we are subscribers to the Tallahassee Democrat. If I understand what you are saying, by not articulating or notifying Counsel that I received that newspaper, I am ex parte receiving information about a trial of a pending appeal or two, in this Court which has so skewed, tainted, violated the constitutional principles governing review, that I cannot sit fairly and pass sentence -- review sentence?

MR. FRANKEL: Well, Your Honor, with respect, that's not quite what I am saying.

JUSTICE ENGLAND: But, that is what your words have said because you said that we have considered matters which nobody knew about relevant -- I assume relevant -- and material to the process, and that alone has thrown this statute out of kilter.

MR. FRANKEL: Your Honor, I obviously made unfortunate use of the language because I mean to say much more than that. If this Court sits in a case involving General Motors, a civil case, breach of contract case, and its members from time to time have read Fortune Magazine or the Tallahassee Democrat or anything else about General Motors, nobody complains about that. For one thing, lawyers who are alive and well and literate are probably aware that among the items of literature that float around in the world, that judges, like ordinary human beings, may have read are these newspaper things, magazine things and so on.

CHIEF JUSTICE SUNDBERG: Law Review articles.

MR. FRANKEL: Law Review articles. And they may cope with that publicly familiar information. But, if in the General Motors case, Your Honor, the Court sent for an inquiry made about General Motors that bore on this particular breach of contract or even if the Court sent for so bland a thing as a Dunn and Bradstreet and didn't tell anybody about it in connection with that very case, I think the Bar would rise up in outrage. Judges don't do that ex parte. Now, the judge might say --

JUSTICE ENGLAND: That goes to violation of the code of judicial conduct and to behavior. That doesn't go to the material, because I am postulating-- and I don't know -- but I am postulating that in that material of the trial there may have been some discussion in the Tallahassee Democrat of legal material not admitted into the record of those trials, and yet we're supposed to sit here and review the record, as you said, unsupported by outside material, not added to or subtracted from. Isn't the principle the same?

MR. FRANKEL: No, Your Honor, it's not. The due process clause in both your Constitution, which Your Honors know better, and in the Federal Constitution that governs us all is addressed to flesh and blood human beings living in the real world. And when we consider a case like Gardner which said the trial judge should not look at a confidential presentence investigation statement or statements, I don't think anybody would read that case, Your Honor, to say that that trial judge, if it happened to be in the Bundy case, would be disqualified because he had read the newspaper. I just think there is an enormous difference between those two kinds of information.

JUSTICE ENGLAND: Okay. But, let me ask a follow-up to Justice Sundberg's question. Is the United States Supreme Court's review function in capital cases any different from ours?

MR. FRANKEL: Yes, Your Honor. I do think the function is different. I think the function of this Court is broader, more critical to the sustaining of the statute if it could be sustained, and more nearly, more nearly on the Court's own statements, de novo. This Court has talked of making an independent judgment in sentencing. It's talked of the vital importance of facts, of its careful review of the record.

Now, I don't think the Court has used -- so far as I know -- the standard corpus juris expression "de novo." I don't claim -- we don't claim and I don't think we have to claim that it is a de novo determination. But, it is certainly much more than a review to see if the findings below were clearly erroneous or anything as simple and detached as that.

JUSTICE ENGLAND: Mr. Frankel, just a second. The last part of my question is, if the United States Supreme Court is a different function -- and I take it you are saying it is not that kind of a review -- how do you explain Godfrey versus Georgia?

MR. FRANKEL: Your Honor, the capital sentencing situation is so tense and so troublesome and so delicate that the line between what the Supreme Court does in normal cases and where it may dip into what are normally State concerns is very hard to discern. And I am not prepared to say I am an authority on that. Normally, it's for the states to say what the rules of evidence are and what rules of procedure are. In death cases that seems to change.

Now, what I would urge upon Your Honors is that if there were no Supreme Court of the United States, and if we assumed, as this petition does assume, that this is the final tribunal; and if we assume, as this petition does assume, Your Honors will realize that lawyers -- lots of lawyers considering a grave matter like this among other things considered where we go, what kind of proceeding do we bring. Now, for a variety of reasons, we're here and not in some low Federal court.

But, one of those reasons I think we can fairly state to Your Honors is that it really ought to be the function of this Court to speak the final words for this state about a matter involving the life and death of people brought to court in this state. So, I would say that this problem of whether this Court has been forced to deal with so heavy a burden under a statute that doesn't work with guidance on judgments that ought to be legislative, with guidance that is insufficient, under standards that are unacceptable, the judgment about that subject ought to be this Court's, without wondering what the people in Washington will say by way of second-guessing or even intrusion into what's normally state function. Florida has a due process clause. Florida has a code of judicial conduct.

JUSTICE ADKINS: Mr. Frankel?

MR. FRANKEL: Yes, sir.

JUSTICE ADKINS: Let me follow up something on Justice England's questions concerning the newspaper articles in relation to, say, a pending case.

As I understood your argument, in a newspaper article or something of general dissemination, then you can assume that perhaps defense counsel had equal knowledge and that that's quite different than something that gets into the court file and the defense attorney knows nothing about it. You were drawing that distinction, as I recall; is that correct?

MR. FRANKEL: Yes, Your Honor.

JUSTICE ADKINS: Now, let me ask you: Concerned citizens -- and admirably so -- throughout the state of Florida become interested in the administration of justice. And quite frequently, we get letters from people that are not involved in the lawsuit at all, but people who as citizens feel like they have the right to write something to the Supreme Court -- some are for and some against the death penalty. And it being a matter of great public concern at the present time, it's only natural that we could assume that such correspondence would take place with these letters coming in.

My query is: If a letter comes in and we are aware of the letter, perhaps, or the contents, is that something that could eventually invalidate the death sentences by correspondence with citizens that are not involved in the lawsuit?

MR. FRANKEL: If I have to give a short answer -- which I am not very good at -- I would say the answer is no, Your Honor. That's a relatively insignificant item very familiar to Bench and Bar and we all assume correctly or not that judges are impervious to that. I would add, Your Honors, if the Court were calling upon me to advise that that should be made part of the record in that case. If a letter comes in about Bundy telling the Court what a villain he is and that you ought to affirm his -- I don't know Bundy, but his name was mentioned. He's as good an example as any -- and that his conviction ought to be confirmed for this, that or the other reason, I think that that letter should be made a part of that record. And I know that sentencing judges in places where I have been do disclose such communications to counsel. They are not of great consequence, but even so, counsel, I believe, are entitled to see them.

But, where you're dealing with a course of action by the Court initiating communications, requesting communications, receiving them; and receiving them not from some volunteer letter writer, not from the Tallahassee Democrat, but from the executive branch of government, which taken in the large is the adversary litigant in a case involving death.

JUSTICE OVERTON: Mr. Frankel, do you understand the procedure in this state concerning presentence investigation reports and where they are put?

MR. FRANKEL: Your Honor, I would not claim to be an authority on where they are put. I believe they wind up in the Department of Corrections at the moment, but --

JUSTICE OVERTON: All right. Let me ask you this. If a presentence investigation report is used in the sentencing process, this Court should have it; should it not?

MR. FRANKEL: I would think so, Your Honor, yes, as part of its consideration of a death penalty. I would think it's appropriate for the Court to have it on the record with everybody knowing the Court has it, not as an item not included in the formal record and then solicited by the Court ex parte as has happened in a number of the cases we cite.

JUSTICE OVERTON: Now, Mr. Frankel, if the Court has requested a presentence -- a copy of a presentence investigation report, and in answer to that request it does not get the presentence investigation report but gets the post-sentence investigation report, which it subsequently returns, does that contaminate that proceeding such that the death penalty could not be imposed?

MR. FRANKEL: It might, Your Honor, because I think -- I say it might because it would depend on what then happened. If, for example, all --

JUSTICE OVERTON: Just the fact that they sent us the wrong document, that it got into the court file.

MR. FRANKEL: If it got into the court file and it set here in that file for a period of months and that was a file that the Justices of this Court review in toto, then I would say that that might well be sufficient in itself to invalidate the decision on the appeal of that death sentence in that case. Again, I'm -- with the Court's permission, since I have had an explanation of these lights and I have a white one, I am going to ask for a very few minutes to take care of the unlikely contingency that Mr. Georgieff will say something that I disagree with. But, I do want to say that our claim rests on a very broad pattern of conduct of its capital sentencing business by this Court that in a strong expression a description of what we do urge vitiates this appellate process which is a keystone of the whole system and demonstrates the invalidity of the system.

So, it is not easy to appreciate what we think is the extent of our position by reducing it to one case, though if we had only one case here, one petitioner here, the position would be exactly the same. It is an assault ultimately on the system, on the statute under which Your Honors work and acclaim that the statute doesn't work and that it's invalid.

JUSTICE ENGLAND: Mr. Frankel, I don't want you to lose your rebuttal time either, and I will ask Chief if he would allow me in my time a couple more questions because the breadth of your petition is what interests me.

In Appendix B that you have attached to the petition, on Page 19 you have a document that pertains to George Vasil. He's not a Petitioner in this case; in fact, his sentence was reduced to life.

You also have on Page 29 a document from the file of Benjamin Huckaby, who is not a Petitioner and whose sentence was reduced to life.

On Page 76, you have one from Manning, who is not a Petitioner and whose conviction was reversed and remanded for a new trial.

Now, if you are right that the taint that you have alleged in fact has occurred and so affects capital sentencing process you have described in your petition, "The practice of this Court has infected and prejudicially skewed its review of every death sentence.

THe capital sentencing process in Florida has become tainted at its highest and most important judicial level." Those are quotes from your petition, Page 13.

If that's correct, then what you are suggesting in Section E, this proportionality review of your petition, doesn't it follow that we must also vacate every life sentence we have imposed on the ground that that was a product of the same fatally defective process?

MR. FRANKEL: Your Honor, it's certainly not our claim and we don't represent anybody who is complaining of a life sentence and would rather be killed.

JUSTICE ENGLAND: That's not the point.

MR. FRANKEL: The point -- well, let's -- we claim the statute is invalid. What happened when Florida's statute was invalidated in effect by Gregg? You vacated all the death sentences.

CHIEF JUSTICE SUNDBERG: Furman.

MR. FRANKEL: Pardon? By Furman, I beg your pardon. You vacated all the death sentences.

JUSTICE ENGLAND: But here you are making a broader claim.

MR. FRANKEL: In a word, that's what we're asking for.

JUSTICE ENGLAND: No, no, you have just told us that you are making a very broad claim. And I understand that to be that our process has been tainted. That means -- and you talked about the life sentences. That would, I think, mean that we have done something equally egregious in reviewing the life sentences. In fact, that's what you said earlier today.

Should we not, for the very reasons you allege -- this may be the right result -- start this process over with everybody -- I'm going to the process now, not the invalidity of the statute, which I understand to be a different argument. Wouldn't that be the logical conclusion of what you are suggesting?

MR. FRANKEL: No, Your Honor. Apart from whether logic is the life of the law, which I won't bother us with, we're complaining about death sentences. The language has its limits and I have my limits in using it. I am complaining about death sentences. We're complaining about the process by which people are sentenced to die.

Now, we compare them -- we compare them with sentences to life imprisonment in order to bring out and demonstrate the infirmity in the system, but the infirmity of which we complain -- we wouldn't be here if all of these people had life sentences. And a court, after all, I assume hears the complaint of the aggrieved people who come before it.

Our only complaint is not about how people are sentenced to life imprisonment. That may be some other case. We are complaining about how people are put to death. And a part of that process is that some people get what we want: Life imprisonment. It's not something that the ordinary citizen asks for. But, in these cases these Petitioners say that the sentence they should have had could not be more than life imprisonment because they could not validly be sentenced to die. And when they attack the process, they say it is a process that is inadequate for the execution of defendants.

When the Supreme Court invalidated statute after statute and talked about all of them as being the grounds of decision between those who may live and those who must die, it didn't say a word that impaired or infected the life sentences of any of the states: North Carolina, Georgia, Florida or anybody. Its impact was on the death sentences.

Now, we claim under that jurisprudence, under what's grown up as a kind of somber capital sentencing body of constitutional law that Florida statute is invalid and that the death sentences which confront substantially all of these Petitioners -- there are changes from day to day -- those death sentences should be vacated.

JUSTICE ENGLAND: Two minor matters -- and I appreciate your answer on that. I want to be clear on one thing. I take it from the premise that it's really irrelevant to your petitions that the information or the materials we received were inadvertently or advertently received. It really doesn't matter, as I understand your argument; is that correct?

MR. FRANKEL: Your Honor, that would not be quite correct. I don't think I would want to present a hypothetical that we might press when the facts on which we proceed are stronger than that. These are advertent requests for information and receipts of information.

JUSTICE ENGLAND: Well, no, I thought earlier in your argument you said the mere presence in the file of materials which were subject to consideration by this Court in its total review function tainted the process. It wouldn't seem to matter one way or the other.

MR. FRANKEL: Your Honor, I must be using a lot of words that I would like to retract. If that's what I said, I didn't mean it.

JUSTICE ENGLAND: So, advertence does make a difference.

MR. FRANKEL: If somebody could prove that there are things in this -- that all the things that we talk about in this Court's files were never looked at by any Justice, that somehow in reading the whole file --

JUSTICE ENGLAND: No, no, that's what we saw. I am talking about how they got there for the moment. I thought you had said it didn't matter how they got there as long as they were there.

MR. FRANKEL: No, I didn't say that, Your Honor. And if I did, I withdraw it. I said that the motives didn't matter, that we believed the ultimate purposes of the Court as a whole -- the Justices, the Clerk's Office, whoever -- were purposes that could readily be seen to be beneficent. And I said that didn't matter.

JUSTICE ENGLAND: So, it does matter then if all the materials were on an ultimate fact-finding suppose really occurred, all materials were the result of no action of the Justices at all and all of it came, let's say, from an assistant clerk's error in asking for the wrong things -- hypothetical -- are you saying that that inadvertence therefore eliminates the complaint you have?

MR. FRANKEL: Your Honor, I take a minute to embrace that hypothetical because it seems to me to be a little way from the apparent facts as they emerge. But, I accept it for the sake of argument. If some assistant clerk repeatedly caused contaminating materials to be in the files of this Court and if this Court over a period of months or years, the Justices of this Court reading every file from cover to cover allowed that to continue and imposed death sentences in the course of operating in that fashion, if one can picture that degree of inadvertence in seven distinguished jurists, then we would argue yes, that invalidates the process.

JUSTICE ENGLAND: So, inadvertence doesn't matter. Okay.

MR. FRANKEL: It could.

JUSTICE ENGLAND: I thought that's what you were saying.

MR. FRANKEL: We claim much more than inadvertence.

JUSTICE ENGLAND: I understand.

MR. FRANKEL: Driven to this situation where all accidentally, all beknownst to the Justices, the stuff gets into the files, the Justices read it year-in and year-out, don't fire that assistant clerk, don't raise a question how is this stuff getting into our files, and go ahead and adjudicate in that fashion, just as any other deleterious ex parte materials appearing in a court record with that kind of irregularity would lead to a determination of invalidity, we would say those death sentences are certainly invalid. Thank you, Your Honors.

CHIEF JUSTICE SUNDBERG: Counsel, Mr. Marshal, by my count Justice England took up eight minutes of your rebuttal. I assume that's what you had reference to when you were referring to Mr. Georgieff. Is that your count, Mr. Marshal? Would you reserve eight minutes then in his rebuttal?

MR. FRANKEL: Your Honor, I certainly appreciate that. I don't think Mr. Georgieff will cause me to get up for any great length of time. Thank you.

MR. GEORGIEFF: Mr. Chief Justice, may it please the Court, as you know our aspect of this comes down to the Motion to Dismiss that we filed for the reasons that we included in it and which I hope to articulate here in the event that it isn't clear from what we did file.

In response to Mr. Justice Overton's question, I heard Judge Frankel say if you got a post-sentence report as opposed to a pre- that you requested, which should have been sent up but was not, depending on the extent to which you looked at it and even though you did send it back, you might or might not have to reverse in this or that case. Now, you have heard everything about "E" today in their petition. You have heard nothing about the other claims.

We contend and we agree that if what they said was so and if you could equate Gardner to a status which included your function as well as that of the trial courts, we agreed that that question was a valid and proper one. We disagreed on the conclusion that because there conceivably may be a circumstance in which you will find one case to have been affected by something extrinsic of the record, that you have got to wipe it all out.

Well, that didn't happen in Gardner and would you believe it didn't happen in Witherspoon. In Witherspoon, the one that everybody knows about -- and, by the way, a capital case, as was Gardner, and Gardner was a Florida case -- nothing happened like that. And, by the way, you asked the question about Godfrey. I think, Mr. Justice England, you asked about Godfrey. What is Godfrey all about if they are correct in their position saying if we can demonstrate that this is the general posture in which you find it -- which, by the way, they haven't done -- if they can do that, then the whole must fall because we think we may be able to show that one either could or should not have been done.

Now, we submit that their argument has to fail for that very reason. They tell you that we're necessarily incomplete in what we urge here. Why? I have no notion of why they're incomplete. Your files are available to them. Files of the Department of Corrections are available to them. They represent an aggregation of some 80 legal minds, which perhaps in the area of capital punishment, certainly in Florida, are exceeded only by those on the staff of Jim Smith.

And I am telling you that there is no reason why they couldn't come to you and plead the individual cases. I think Mr. Justice England, you asked the question, "Well, what happens and how do we reach the cases that have long left our jurisdiction by the issuance of a mandate, by this, by any other means you want?" And, indeed, with Spinkelink, by death itself. All right. If they file the individual petitions that we contend are a requisite before anything intelligent can be done about it, you can reach every one of them--every one.

You cannot do it on the first one because there are areas which simply do not get to it because they can't put themselves into the posture of people who are going to benefit in an aggregation where they can't show the tie. We go back again to Gardner. What does it mean to say that I am going to plead that something may have been done to me because I think I can show that something was done over here? That has nothing necessarily to do with me.

I will give you circumstances not literal, hypothetical. Let's assume for the moment that somebody volunteers some information to you. You come by it honestly, intelligently, any way you want. I am not going to poison anybody's well. I don't know or care what your motives are. I know and care what you do. That's what's measured.

Washington never knows about your motives anymore than we do. The whole point is what have you done? If you did do something, it has got to be evidenced by some activity on your part, by some writing, by some utterance. If you didn't do it, I want to know what has to result as to those cases in which it was not done.

How about in Hargrave? In Hargrave didn't you tell the Bench and the Bar that, you know, you told the world, and I suppose that includes lawyers, Look, what your function is is to review, not to impose the sentence. You don't impose any sentences. You may reduce them because you find that some of the mitigating were improperly withheld, some of the aggregating were improperly assessed. You may do many, many things, but all you do is determine whether what the trial court did squares with due process as you understand it to be under Florida law and to the extent that is necessary under Federal law.

When that leaves this Court, then the last bastion is in Washington where they determine whether what everybody did, including you as the terminal treatise, whether what you did squares with Federal law or collides with it to a degree necessary for them to write something. If they do, then they strike it down. If they are apprehensive, they remand it as they did in Gardner or, when it came up in Witherspoon, and as they will do again in Godfrey.

The whole point is, these are correcting attitudes. You cannot correct if you strike it down.

They tell you the statute is infirmed because we believe, it has come to seem, you know, all of these, just like Merlin with his magic wand, it seems as though. What seems?

I don't believe that they can't find whatever it is they need to plead and prove their case. If they do, you have in front of you all the machinery necessary by appointing a commissioner, by setting it down for this type of hearing, by any type you want to find out whether anything infirmed occurred.

Indeed, the whole posture of it is that you don't need any information to aggravate a sentence above what it is. They all come to you as death. So, if there were to be any complaint that was intelligent and based on something very real, it ought to come from the people who wind up defending the death sentences, that is to say us. But, you don't hear that complaint from us.

He tells you that as you went along here the reason that you have an infirmity of such magnitude that you have to reverse all the cases is because the ones that were reduced to life imprisonment maybe don't matter, but those other people have a right to say, "Well, now, wait a minute, because you messed up the system, we think that all of it must go because the taint simply cannot be removed."

What he is really telling you is that you didn't make mistakes in all the cases, which puts us back to where we were. If you have an individual complaint in which you can demonstrate this, then very simply you go ahead, make your allegations and if you can prove them in this forum or one appointed by it or delegated, then very simply you may have an opportunity to prevail. And if you can prove it, perhaps you should. I do not understand how on a tangent somebody should pick up the benefit in a circumstance that conceivably could have happened in some other case.

He tells you ex parte. What is ex parte? If you look at Page 30 of the exhibits they furnished, you will find a notice there about a PSI being requested. And I notice that Mr. Marky's name is carried on the left-hand margin as one of the parties who were told about it and defense counsel on the other.

Now, is that ex parte? And that points up what again I am telling you, that very simply they paint either with too broad a brush or they don't want to use a narrow one or they don't want to paint at all. They want you to do it on the theory that the statute is infirmed. The statute is not infirmed. You have said so. United States Supreme Court has said so and that's beyond peradventure.

If he suggests that what may have occurred over a span of time in this tribunal, either deliberately or otherwise, so infects the proceedings that it ruins them all, I ask you about Gardner, I ask you about Witherspoon and I ask you about Godfrey. They don't all fall. We correct it if it's wrong, but we require that they allege and prove that it is wrong as to each individual whom they think it may be applied to, not across the board.

JUSTICE ENGLAND: Mr. Georgieff, help me with my recollection. There's a blurring in the argument that I heard -- and I didn't get a chance to ask Mr. Frankel to straighten it out -- between ex parte and record and nonrecord, two different concepts, but they keep getting pushed together.

With regard to record and nonrecord, am I correct-- I have a recollection that in some capital cases that have come to this Court there have been motions by I think public defenders or private counsel to supplement the record with materials which were never in the trial of the court below?

MR. GEORGIEFF: Yes, that has occurred, not too frequent, but it has.

JUSTICE ENGLAND: If my recollection is accurate, further some of those materials related to post-sentence, either conversations or reports or something in the Corrections system. I also believe, by the way, the State -- your office -- has moved to dismiss all those as being improper.

MR. GEORGIEFF: Most of the time unsuccessfully.

JUSTICE ENGLAND: Unsuccessfully?

MR. GEORGIEFF: Yes. Let me explain. I don't want to be --

JUSTICE ENGLAND: No, I am just trying to recall because if the point is valid about record and non-record and that we're obliged not to have things that are outside the file, I'm trying to relate that to the request of some counsel to have things outside the record file for our review. Your recollection is the same as mine?

MR. GEORGIEFF: No, but if you are asking is that an accurate recollection, the answer is yes, it is.

JUSTICE ENGLAND: That's all I am really asking you.

MR. GEORGIEFF: Now, I don't want to be strapped to what it was you may particularly recall because I couldn't give it to you now without doing a little bit of searching, but, yes, that has occurred and really it isn't all that infrequent. Matter of fact, at all levels below capital cases it occurs with alarming frequency.

Now, you know, whether it's done for this or that means, he simply, I would assume by that and you by your inquiry, is saying, well, if it's initiated by counsel, then, one, it can't be ex parte; two, it can't be anything but it is dehors the record, extrinsic, whatever you want to call it. Now, I don't pretend to know how you would resolve that, but for our purposes --

CHIEF JUSTICE SUNDBERG: Let me ask you -- that's a loose term, "dehors the record." The PSI, to my knowledge, since I have been here, is carried in a special part of the court file. It is never a part of the record below; is it?

MR. GEORGIEFF: It depends on which it is, Judge.

CHIEF JUSTICE SUNDBERG: My recollection of the criminal rule is that it is delivered by Parole and Probation to the trial court for use during sentencing. And that's in all cases.

MR. GEORGIEFF: Yes.

CHIEF JUSTICE SUNDBERG: Delivered back to Parole and Probation and ultimately finds its way here to Tallahassee.

MR. GEORGIEFF: Yes.

CHIEF JUSTICE SUNDBERG: And that doesn't become-- although it was utilized, everybody knows it was utilized by the trial court -- it does not become a part of the record because of the issue of confidentiality as to the entire report.

MR. GEORGIEFF: No, of the proper record, you are correct, sure.

CHIEF JUSTICE SUNDBERG: All right. And then those then, where they are material, have come over to this and repose in the court file in this Court; correct?

MR. GEORGIEFF: Yes.

CHIEF JUSTICE SUNDBERG: Is that dehors the record?

MR. GEORGIEFF: Not in my view. And certainly -- I don't even care if literally it falls within something that doesn't fit within the accordion file. It isn't that that's contemplated by what it is they're talking about. I guarantee you that that cannot be error. The reason for that is very simply Counsel knows about it because it's requested. Now, there may be -- you know, there may be things in it that he doesn't want in. But, the point is, he does know about it. So, though it may be physically not incorporated in what you and I generally refer to as the record, he does know about it. So, it's not extrinsic, unlike a post-sentence report, which might come inadvertently, might come this way, that way. When everything is done and let's say a court already has the case, so in that regard it's similar and yet it's different, if you understand what I mean.

CHIEF JUSTICE SUNDBERG: Unless that was ascertainable, too, but, go ahead.

MR. GEORGIEFF: Yeah, but there may be a host of situations, any one of which -- now, you could go into hypotheticals all day long. Somebody may say, "Well, what in the name of heaven would anybody on this Court be asking the Department of Corrections for this, that, or the other?" Well, it may be that it's a whole lot simpler to get the identical item from them as opposed to the Clerk of the Circuit Court, as you suggest, the PSI, which is late in arriving sometimes 10, 15 weeks.

Now, I do not care where you got it, if you got anything. It doesn't make any difference. The whole point is when these people are ready and willing and able to stand here and tell you that as to this case, you did this, you did this, and you did this, and that is legally impermissible under any view of due process and you cannot find any reason to gainsay it, then they have a basis on which to complain. They certainly cannot do it under the "E" complaint, which is the only thing they have argued, by the way. And by limiting their argument to that, they have illuminated what we said about the balance of the claim, has to come in individually or it simply can't make it. And I don't --

JUSTICE ENGLAND: I think they were limited a little bit by the questions to the "E." I expected they intended to get into A through F.

MR. GEORGIEFF: Perhaps so, but let's put it this way. I will advance it affirmatively as our argument, if that is the case; and if it isn't, I submit that very simply, you know, petitions for habeas corpus have been coming here for as long as the Court has been here. None of that is frightening or awesome or anything like that.

I don't like the idea of treating 123 individually any more than you may or they may. But, the whole point is I don't know how you can throw baby out with bathwater by simply saying we think there may -- and, by the way, they base it on what? On newspaper articles and a handful of letters?

Now, I don't know which one of you would recall that cases are won or lost on that as evidence. I do not think so. And I don't think you will either.

Now, with regard to the complaint that's been made on the "E": You can decide that without any prejudice to the remaining people, whoever they may be, whether there are 123, 122 or whatever increment. You can do that on any basis you want without prejudice for them to come back to you. And if they are able to demonstrate a sufficient quantum of allegations and visible proof that they fall somewhere under either of the other five claims and thereby you can take care of everything that is necessary. And I might add, by the way, you know, if we're wrong, how come Pippin got his case set down to life imprisonment last week, just last week by this Court? Now, he was in the group and that's a fait accompli; the decision is out. It's reduced to life. What? If it was so infected that it encompasses everybody, how did he wind up on the beneficial end? That's a good question that they ought to ask, and I don't know...

Ten days ago you were petitioned by Mr. Lacey Mahon of Jacksonville, and an attorney by the name of Hirsch, to include their cases in this aggregation of 123 with nothing but a blanket motion saying that they, too, were on death row, and they, too, should be permitted to be included in this group for disposition, fair or foul, as to how it goes. You issued your order on the 17th of October denying that.

Now, if we are wrong in our motion, that order denying their motion was wrong, and they should have been included. And I will say that if the position advanced by Judge Frankel today is correct, once again, their motion should have been granted. If it so infects the whole proceeding that there is no escaping it, then literally you have got to take in everybody, even though you are confronted with what you inquired about, Mr. Justice England. And that is to say, how do we get to them unless we make it a blanket proposition. And, in the writing, when you do write it, if you do, tell them how Godfrey doesn't apply and tell them how Gardner doesn't apply, tell them how Witherspoon doesn't apply and all the others that don't reach down to the bottom level and make it impossible for anything to continue.

I might add, what about the handful of cases that exist in your court where all you had is a notice of appeal and absolutely nothing else? It simply has not matured. Are those, too, infirmed? Are they, for either the reasons advanced here by the Judge or any that you have heard or any that you can think of? Now, I don't know what went on if anything went on. What I do know is if they suspected something did and if it is of the nature or status that they tell you that it has to be, then they know how to plead and they know how to prove. And our position is very simply at least and until they do, that there is no way that they can prevail with the kind of claim that they have advanced here under "E," and they certainly can't under the others because they haven't argued them.

Now, you are not disposing of any individual claims here. You are simply disposing of the general claim that they belong under some sort of an umbrella, magic or otherwise, which will give every one of them the kind of relief that they say they want.

Now, if that's true, then very simply it leaves intact all the rights that the others have to come in and plead whenever and however and to what degree they want to show that their claims have indeed been violated. You have handled scores of thousands of them over the years and you certainly know how to do it now. Thank you.

CHIEF JUSTICE SUNDBERG: Mr. Frankel.

MR. FRANKEL: Your Honor, Mr. Georgieff has been so becoming that I will try to use only seven of my eight minutes.

CHIEF JUSTICE SUNDBERG: The Court thanks you.

MR. FRANKEL: I want to say that as to the number of Petitioners, this, of course, is a question mooted in the papers. Our broad contention is that there is an invalid system under an invalid statute for the imposition of death sentences, and we could, of course, present that broad position starting with Mr. Brown by these Petitioners one at a time. I'm advised that this Court, like many other courts in America, is busy. And believing that the broad claim is a responsible and principled one that this Court would want to reach on the merits, we thought it appropriate in the service of the Court and of the Petitioners to bring them on all at once. And we may be right in our claim and we may be wrong, but it is presented in earnest and in some detail as amplified in this oral argument. And we do urge it upon the Court. It's ripe for decision and we trust that the Court will decide it.

There are cases in which a capital sentence goes to the Supreme Court of the United States and only that particular case is reversed. There are cases, and their names are familiar to all of us, where a particular petitioner goes to the Supreme Court of the United States and the result of his effort is to invalidate across the board the statute under which his sentence was imposed.

And we say to Your Honors that we hope that the law in Florida can be made satisfactorily in Florida; and what the Supreme Court of the United States may or may not do, ought not to be of particular concern at this juncture. But, we do say, we are compelled to in representing our clients, that we present this as a Proffitt case, which was won by the prosecution in Florida; as a Furman case, which was lost by Georgia; as a case that does bring into question the whole statutory scheme. And it's not possible, we think, to avoid answering that question by talking about all the horrendous consequences of one answer or another. If we're right, of course, the motions of 10 days ago could conveniently have been granted. But, it doesn't make any difference because if we're right and if we win, those two movants will get the relief to which we claim they are entitled anyhow.

It doesn't advance this inquiry to wonder why this Court may or may not have granted some motion before it heard a full presentation of the issue that we now place before you.

Now, on the question of what's ex parte and what's in the record, I just want to add this, that first I am informed, and I do not know for sure, but a number of these spectators are very interested legal people -- I am informed that characteristically when they have moved to supplement the record, including motions to supplement with psychiatric information on their capital appeals, the motions have been denied. I don't know whether that's uniformly true or not. I don't think it matters.

What I do know is that it is a whole world different to have a motion on the record, copy to Counsel, saying, let's make this piece of paper a part of the record and fight about it from the situation where a piece of paper finds its way into the record and is considered and one party doesn't know anything about it. One is ex parte. That's what the canons and the Constitution denies. The other is not ex parte. Whether the Court wants to add to its record or not is a familiar kind of question that has a familiar kind of answer.

Now, the way oral argument --

JUSTICE ENGLAND: Mr. Frankel?

MR. FRANKEL: Yes, sir.

JUSTICE ENGLAND: That leads me to ask your request for the appointment of a commissioner to find facts, isn't that really irrelevant? If you have got enough in Exhibit B to indicate that in any file there was a request from the Court for a document which found its way in, haven't you made the point that you are seeking and it is irrelevant how it got there, what the motives were, what we did with it, how long it was there? I am trying to really understand what you are saying is important and what isn't.

MR. FRANKEL: I'm trying with mixed success to help you understand the scope of our position, Your Honor. We claim, we allege a pattern and practice. We allege responsibly as Counsel that the materials in this Appendix, however thick, are necessarily only illustrative. We tell you because you know anyhow that among the inquiries we would have to make in order to state the full scope of this pattern and practice are inquiries we have never made of Your Honors, among other things.

JUSTICE ENGLAND: What difference? I thought your point is --

MR. FRANKEL: Well, it makes a big difference.

JUSTICE ENGLAND: If the documents are there you have already documented what you have in Appendix B --

MR. FRANKEL: Your Honor, if you accept our allegations which are undenied that there is a broad pattern and practice that this happens a lot, we accept that basis of adjudication. If you agree and as a pleading matter -- and we don't think an important case like this necessarily goes off on pleadings -- but, if Mr. Georgieff agrees with us that this is a pervasive pattern and practice in this Court to take in these kind of materials and inferentially at least to consider them, then we'd submit the case to you on that basis.

JUSTICE ENGLAND: So, your request for a commissioner is only to find out if it's a pervasive practice?

MR. FRANKEL: Your Honor, it's only anticipatory on the assumption that if our allegations in their full breadth are denied and if issues of fact arise, factual questions would be presented to be explored. We claim a broad pattern and practice. If it's admitted, well, then the claim is presented, it's ripe and the facts we allege present issues of law.

If it's denied or disputed, evidentiary questions arise.

JUSTICE ENGLAND: So, then it is not your position that if it happened in one case, that's the end of the capital sentencing process? It has to be a pervasive practice.

MR. FRANKEL: Yes, Your Honor, that's our position. Well, it has to have been a frequent practice. And if the Court finds it material to discriminate among words like "frequent, pervasive, broad, general," for purposes of this legal question, and if those refinements might relate to concrete facts, we are prepared to assist the Court in finding those facts the most expeditious way possible and that's what the Master's about.

JUSTICE ENGLAND: But if the critical word is "isolated," then you would have no complaint?

MR. FRANKEL: Well, we would have a complaint and it depends on how isolated.

JUSTICE ENGLAND: Now, you're fudging the words a little bit.

MR. FRANKEL: Your Honor, I am dealing with somewhat hypothetical facts.

JUSTICE ENGLAND: I'm merely trying to find out what the basis of your argument is because I thought that your attack and your argument was focused on the point that if it happened once, it proves the process is wrong and our statute will not operate and must be invalidated.

MR. FRANKEL: Your Honor, I would not permit myself on behalf of these Petitioners to be reduced to that position. If it happened once, I don't think I would be standing here arguing that it invalidates the statute. And we allege, and nobody denies yet, a great deal more than once and that's the position on which we submit the case to Your Honors now.

JUSTICE ENGLAND: But it wasn't really the factual difference that is the focus point, Mr. Frankel, I am really trying to grasp, because it is the proportionality concept that you say is required of us and that would be distorted by one as prejudicially potentially as by 50.

MR. FRANKEL: No, Your Honor, it wouldn't any more than -- what shall I say -- refusing to serve a Chinese one day because some waitress had a headache would show racial discrimination. We're talking about a pattern and practice. Now, how many instances make a pattern and practice could be a subject of discussion. And, if it is to be discussed, we'll discuss it.

I want to say, Your Honors, if I may that the oral argument is for the service of the Court and it's been directed and I appreciate that on behalf of the clients to a great extent by questions from the Court. I think it must be said in protection of the clients' interests, however, that we do not abandon any of the positions urged in this petition. It's not just "E." It's the whole petition.

CHIEF JUSTICE SUNDBERG: That's understood, Mr. Frankel.

MR. FRANKEL: Thank you, Your Honor.

CHIEF JUSTICE SUNDBERG: Thank you very much. That concludes the Court's docket for today.

(Whereupon, the proceedings were concluded.)
